He fails to explain, because it can not be explained, by what process such a mail service is to be secured by the United States except with the assistance of the Government. Every year for a quarter of a century the demands of our foreign mails and their tonnage have been constantly increasing. With the enlargement of our commerce and its extension around the world there has naturally been an increase of mail. With the constantly increasing volume of American travel, tourist and commercial, there has been still further increase of mail, but there has been no addition, or practically none, to American mail facilities in the foreign service.

We are still dependent upon foreign nations for the efficiency and the regularity of our mail service. We are deriving no benefits in a commercial sense from its growth and expansion. Great Britain requires that all of her outward-bound ocean mails shall be carried under the British flag and by steamers under British control. Germany since 1885, when the North German Lloyd Asiatic contracts were made, has made practically the same requirement, and all outward-bound German mails are carried to North America, to Asia, to Africa, to Australia, in German steamers.

Germany is also now engaged, by the assistance of the Government, in establishing mail routes to South American points. The French mails to all parts of the world are carried upon French steamers and under the French flag. In order to accomplish this result, Great Britain expends $2,000,000 per year in mail subsidies in excess of her receipts. France spends two millions, though her mail service is much less, and Germany and Japan each spends a million in excess of receipts in order to accomplish this result. These commercial nations, who have a heredity of hundreds of years of ocean transportation and foreign trade, and who look with unusual scrutiny at expenditures and receipts, would never conduct their mail business with foreign countries at so great an annual loss unless they were certain of a compensating gain. That compensating gain is found in the fact that every mail steamer is an ambassador of trade, is an agent for the expansion of commerce, is a means for the opening and the enlargement of markets for the surplus products of the countries whose flag the mail steamer carries.

We all join in the patriotic aspiration of the Senator from Georgia that our mail service shall be equal if not superior to that of England, Germany, and France, but so long as our mail service is carried on the vessels of those countries we are putting them each year still farther onward in the race for equality or supremacy, and making it that much more difficult for the United States to catch up. This sensitiveness on the part of our friends on the other side to a remunerative mail service and loss in the carrying of the mail has never been exhibited in our domestic service. The strength and value of the post-office service of the United States, inland and domestic, is that, regardless of profit or loss, it has been constantly extended with the settler to new regions and outlying settlements.

The mail service through the new Territories is always run at a great loss to the Government for the time, but with incalculable profit to the Government in the assistance which it has rendered to settlement, cultivation, and production. We have not passed the period in our internal mail service of unproductive routes. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who would cast a vote for the abandonment of one of these services which, by the report of the Post-Office Department upon our desks, is managed at a loss to the Government.

Under the contracts which Great Britain, Germany, and France have with their subsidized mail steamers—I use the word "subsidized" because the whole remuneration is practically that—when the loss is so great, they insure that regularity of the service without which, commercially, a mail route is of little value. While this is true of the mail service and its value to Great Britain, Germany, and France, the United States in its mail service to South America, to the Orient, to almost all parts of the world, is dependent upon the policy, or the whim, or the accident of the foreign ship which carries the mail.

We may have a valuable trade at some point or many points, and the foreign mail ship which reaches that place may be taken off by its government because that government does not find it necessary or profitable to longer help a line to run there or because that line or ship may be used as an auxiliary cruiser. Then the American service, the American communication, the American connection utterly fail, and this great Government is helpless so far as that section of the world is concerned. The German Government permits its lines to lay off their fast steamers during the winter season, and during that period the American mail service must follow the line of policy and the wishes and the business opportunities of the owners of the German line.

During the Boer war so many British mail ships were withdrawn by the Government into their service as auxiliary cruisers and transports that the mail service between the United States and Europe was seriously impaired, and we were utterly helpless. I admit that we save money by the present process. We would probably save two millions per year when all the mail routes were established, but we would save it at the expense of our commercial independence; would save it in order to contribute to the efficiency and the strength of foreign merchant marines and foreign naval service.

Our friends upon the other side are fond of quoting the Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, and the patriotic literature of the Revolution. But it was Washington who said that "It is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; it must pay, with a portion of its independence, for whatever it may accept under that character." I commend to our fellow-Senators that part of Washington's Farewell Address.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], always exceedingly careful to be accurate in his figures, will sometimes make mistakes in his comparisons.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from New York will permit me to interrupt him to say that my colleague is necessarily absent. He is uniformly here when not so detained.

Mr. DEPEW. I understand that.

For instance, when he says that England's foreign mails are more than three times what our foreign mails are, the statement conveys an impression which I am sure he did not intend. The foreign mails of Great Britain are three times greater than our foreign mails, but how distributed? Half of the British mails for Europe go only across the channel, from Dover to Calais, an hour's trip, or from Harwich to the Hook of Holland, or from New Haven to Dieppe, a four or six hours' trip. But the foreign mail service of Great Britain, mile for mile and pound for pound, is not greater than the foreign mail dispatched from the United States.

On the contrary, the United States mail is the larger. The difficulty with this statement of my distinguished friend is when he says that we would pay two millions annually for our foreign mails in excess of receipts, while Great Britain pays about $4,500,000 for hers, meaning that, while Great Britain's mail tonnage is three times ours, it pays for it only a little over twice as much as we do. But when you compare mile for mile and pound for pound and find that by that method the United States mail is greater than the foreign mail dispatched from England and nearly equal to the foreign and colonial mails combined dispatched from that country, then you discover it is the real secret of the success of the English mail service, that as a matter of fact they pay over twice as much as does the United States, and by that method secure mail service, not only to their colonies, but all around the globe.

All the Senators who have spoken against this measure have laid stress upon the statement that there is no limit of time, and that therefore there is no sum which the subsidy may not attain. But, gentlemen, this question is always in the power of Congress. It is as much in the power of Congress as it was when Congress withdrew the subsidy from the Collins Line fifty years ago and crushed that line out of existence. Every year Congress will have the reports of the Post-Office Department, showing the amount of subsidies paid and the amount of mail service earnings. Every year the committee in charge of these questions in the two Houses will be investigating rigidly whether the point of maintenance has been so far passed in profit as to create monopoly or undue revenue; so that Congress itself will be to blame if at any time there is an abuse under this measure.

If the hopes of the friends of this bill are realized, ships will be built cheaper and cheaper in the shipyards of the United States, the efficiency of the service will grow with its magnitude, competition, working the same on the sea as it has on land, will reduce prices, and the beneficiary will be the Government as well as the individual.

One of the most eloquent and charming and attractive speakers upon this or any other question whom the Senate and the country are privileged to hear is the distinguished Senator from Missouri. He presented in its most formidable way the current impression that American shipyards have more orders than they can fill in the next two or three years. The Commissioner of Navigation reports that there have been 18 vessels, aggregating about 100,000 tons, which have been launched from American shipyards during the last eight months; but the ways from which these ships were launched are now vacant, and the workmen who were employed upon these ships are now idle.

He reports that it would require, in addition to present orders, 75,000 tons of steamers in the course of construction to keep the yards to their limit and their men fully employed during the coming summer. It is a curious fact that during the last twelve months not a single steamer for foreign trade has been contracted for in an American shipyard, though most of such yards would be glad to receive the orders.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him as to the building of the ship Korea?

Mr. DEPEW. I take the report of the Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. BACON. I will state to the Senator that the Korea, I understand, has just been completed for the service of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. It is the largest steamship, probably, that will be on the Pacific Ocean, and was built for the trade between San Francisco and Hongkong.

Mr. DEPEW. I mean ships built for the foreign trade under the American flag.

Mr. BACON. That will be under the American flag, in the service of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Mr. DEPEW. If that is true, then I stand corrected as to that one ship. Are there any more ships?

Mr. BACON. I understand that there is another one, but I can not recall it. I will state to the Senator that while I do not profess to have any very great familiarity with this subject, I happen to know about that ship from the fact that I am personally acquainted with the captain, who formerly commanded the China, and who has been transferred from the China to the Korea. In that way my attention was particularly called to the fact. Though I will not state it as a fact, it is my impression that there is still another, but of that I am not certain. I am, however, positively certain about the Korea, and she will be the largest ship afloat on the Pacific Ocean; that is, crossing the Pacific Ocean from America to Asia.

Mr. DEPEW. The other ship, I understand, is being built under the subsidy mail contract which the Spreckels have with the United States and with Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. BACON. I had the impression that there was another ship, but I was not prepared to give the information.

Mr. DEPEW. I now recall that the two ships are the Korea and the Sierra, and they are both included in the total tonnage which I have before mentioned as having been launched from American shipyards within the last year. These two steamers were contracted for about three years ago, when the annexation of Hawaii and the application of the coasting laws to that trade, under which these steamers could do an exclusive and therefore a profitable business, were inevitable. Well, upon the question as to what has been done in American shipyards I have here interesting statistics. Of course the contention of my friend, the Senator from Georgia, and his friends is that the American shipyards are doing all that they can; that they are working at a profit; that they at least need no assistance and no help, and that no measure of this kind will add or could add to their present efficiency or the amount of business they do or the number of ships that they turn out.

I think it will be admitted that American talent, American skill, American workmanship, American material are just as good as those of any other country in the world. I think it will be admitted that in many respects they are better. That being the case, if ships could be constructed as cheaply in our shipyards as they can in those of Great Britain, then there would be in the competition a fair share of their business coming to the shipyards of the United States.

Under present conditions there seems to be little prospect after this year for work in our shipyards except for the American Navy and coastwise vessels. That this is a large business we admit, but we ought not to rest satisfied with the building of American naval ships and the construction of vessels for our coasting trade. The demand for shipping under the American flag to go all over the world should be such as to enormously increase our present shipyard capacity, both in old yards and in new.

The writers in magazines and in reviews have been quoted extensively to prove that the American ships can be built as cheaply and run at as little cost as those of foreign nations. Against this I present the official report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1901. He takes the best ship of the American, the British, and the German lines—the St. Louis, of the American; the Oceanic, of the British, and the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, of the German Line. It shows that the total number of officers and men in every department on the St. Louis is 380; on the Oceanic, 427, and on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, 500; and yet the wages, month by month, of the St. Louis are $11,306.09; of the Oceanic, $9,891.32; of the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, $7,715.55.

The report of the Commissioner shows that these averages of from 20 to 30 per cent run equally distinct through the vessels of less tonnage and of slower speed. It distinctively establishes the fact of this difference of operation under the American, the British, and the German flag. Our friends the enemy admit that wages are higher in American shipyards than they are in the British, the German, or the Scandinavian, but they claim that this difference is made up in efficiency of service. The reports of the Commissioner of Navigation year by year and the statistics gathered by the distinguished Senator from Maine apply to ships of equal tonnage and exact counterparts built at shipyards in the United States and abroad.

In each case the difference in cost has been not less than 25 per cent in favor of the foreign shipyard. If this were not so, Yankee skill, ingenuity, push, and energy would be competing for and securing these contracts for foreign ships which are filling the yards of Great Britain and Germany while our yards could successfully do so much more work. We have overcome this difference in wages in locomotives and in steel rails and in other manufactures because of the volume of the product and the magnitude of the demand.

We can not overcome it in shipbuilding until we expand from a retail to a wholesale business. Where we build one large ship foreign shipyards build a hundred, while the reverse is true in the output of those manufactures with which we are successfully competing in the markets of the world. On this subject I quote an authority which I am sure my Democratic friends will not dispute.

The Democracy of the country, in looking for an issue, has also been trying to escape from the handicaps upon their race. One of these handicaps has been Tammany—Tammany government, Tammany mismanagement, and Tammany corruption.

Now, however, there is rejoicing all over the land in the Democratic households, camps, and conventions that Tammany has reformed; that a gentleman of education, of high honor, and of distinction has been placed at the head of the organization, and the Democracy of the country through its press and every organ of opinion welcomes him as an evangel of light and truth. Mr. Louis Nixon, the new leader, is a shipbuilder, as well as a highly educated engineer. I read an extract from a paper presented by Mr. Nixon at the annual meeting of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers within a few months. This society is composed of experts who could not be misled and to whom a statement could not be successfully made unchallenged unless it was absolutely true. The following is the abstract:

> When we are in such a position that we can build several hundred merchant ships a year, we will then have the demand which will enable us to so arrange the building of merchant ships that we can build with reasonable economy, and I have no doubt in the world that by that time we shall be able not only to meet the price of the foreigner, but to come under it. But in order to bring about that condition it is absolutely necessary that there should be a demand for ships which we have not now, and until we can get that it is absurd to talk of building merchant ships as cheaply as they can be built abroad.
> In one of the largest shipyards in this country there are five slips, each capable of building a Campania. On one was a tug, on another was a battle ship, on another was a ferryboat, on another a yacht, and on another a revenue cutter. It is absolutely impossible to practice economies under such circumstances and build the ships so that they would compare favorably in cost with ships built abroad.

The same rule in regard to this difference of from 20 to 30 per cent in the cost which has thus been demonstrated in the construction and in the operation is continued in the maintenance. Thus the three elements of cost, operation, and maintenance, upon which depends profit or loss in ocean navigation, are all against the ship built in America and sailing under the American flag. But if these things are true, "why," says the distinguished Senator from Georgia, "why," says the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, "why is it that Mr. Morgan has purchased the Leyland line of steamers? Why is it that so acute, so able, and so distinguished an investor should put his money and that of his friends in this business?"

I do not know whether they have or not, but, accepting the public reports that they have, the reason is very plain. It is because ocean navigation is profitable. It has been found so by all the maritime countries of the globe. It is profitable, however, only under conditions where competition is upon equal terms. In the close transactions of modern business, whether on land or on the ocean, competition settles the survival of the fittest. If the terms upon which the contest is carried on are equal, then skill, enterprise, and genius for business have their opportunity and win; but a sufficient handicap can make success impossible for the greatest genius in the world.

If these American capitalists have bought these lines, it is not to place them under the American flag; it is not to run them under American conditions; it is not to be handicapped by the difference between American wages and American food as prescribed by law and the wages and the food of the British and the German and the Scandinavian and the Belgian lines; but it is to run them under the flags of those countries where conditions will place the ships and the business on that equality which enable business efficiency to do the business at a profit.

There are millions of American money now invested in shipping—invested because it is a money-making business. But the ships which this American capital owns and runs are run under alien flags because of the inhospitable conditions under our own, because we will not make it possible for these enterprising gentlemen to use their capital under the flag which they love quite as well as we do, and under which they would far prefer to sail their vessels.

There were constructed in the United States during the ten years up to 1901, exclusive of the coasting trade and naval vessels and inclusive only of steamers built exclusively for the foreign trade, ships aggregating 83,715 gross tons. This includes the ships from San Francisco to Australia by way of Hawaii, built since Hawaii was annexed; 5 steamers, built since Cuba was occupied, for that trade and 4 for the trade between New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Jamaica; 2 for Venezuela; and 1, the Pacific mail steamer, between San Francisco and Japan and China.

The output of the British yards during that period of ten years I have not been able to obtain, but of steel steamers of over 1,000 tons burden the British yards launched last year 1,327,979 tons. I ask Senators to place these figures together. I ask Senators who are claiming that we can do as well in the construction of ships as any nation in the world to put these figures upon the walls of their study, carry them in their memorandum books, and paste them in their hats. As against British construction for one year of 1,300,000 tons is the beggarly showing of the United States for ten years of 83,000 tons.

Mr. BACON. If I do not interrupt the Senator, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In the absence of some other Senators who are more immediately in charge of this matter, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The Senator speaks of the construction of ships in the British shipyards, certainly recognizing the fact that Great Britain has no such trade as we have, which we denominate our coastwise trade. Therefore the statistics as to the tonnage manufactured in Great Britain is practically a statement of the entire manufacture of ships by the British shipyards. With us, much the larger part of our manufacture of ships is for the coastwise trade. In order to make a fair comparison the Senator ought not simply to give the work of the shipyards in America in building ships engaged in foreign trade, but he should also include in his statement the amount of manufacture of ships by the American shipyards to be engaged in the coastwise trade.

I will ask the Senator, in order that we may have the advantage of a perfectly correct statement when we go to paste it upon our walls, that he will state not simply the amount of tonnage represented in ships manufactured in the United States shipyards to be engaged in the foreign trade, but that he will add to it and give us the sum total of the tonnage, not only of ships manufactured for the foreign trade, but those also to be engaged in the coastwise trade.

Mr. DEPEW. I will let my friend the Senator gather these figures.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. DEPEW. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to a statement made by the Commissioner of Navigation on page 28 of his report, where he says:

> Eight, possibly ten, trans-Atlantic steamships will be built in the United States during the next two years, which by 1903 will increase the American representation absolutely.

Then he goes on to say that it will not be increased so much in proportion to the other countries, perhaps, as it ought to be.

Mr. DEPEW. I have the figures here only for 1898. I find that the total seagoing tonnage of the world is 11,163,000 tons, probably this year about 12,000,000 tons. Of this, 7,310,000 is British and 3,853,000 is the rest of the world. There were built in British shipyards about 1,400,000 tons, and in all other shipyards of the world 672,000 tons.

Now, the other shipyards of the world included those of Germany, which has been wonderfully stimulated; of Scandinavia, of France, and of Belgium. Without having accurate figures, the Senator will still see that the figures which he has in his hat will not make him proud of his country.

Mr. BACON. They are very vastly different, though, from those suggested by the Senator in his previous statement.

Mr. DEPEW. Within the last ten years the United States has become a creditor nation. During the period of development and construction we drew upon the capital of the world to build our railroads and telegraphs, to dig our canals, to open our mines, and to develop our resources; but the development of the past forty years has been such that our financial position is reversed. In the last decade we have discovered our strength and resources. We have paid off our indebtedness to Europe and repurchased, as far as possible, our securities which were held upon the other side.

American capital, the accumulation from the products of farms and factories and mines, of industry and of labor, has been seeking investment in every direction. Our national wealth was estimated in 1890 at $65,000,000,000 and in 1900 at about ninety-five billions. In round numbers there has been an increase in the national wealth of $30,000,000,000 in the last decade. While much of this is the increase in values of properties which existed ten years ago, a portion of it is profit in cash, which must go somewhere for profitable employment. It has diligently pursued every channel, first through the cautious investor, seeking security at the lowest rate of interest, and next through the venturesome and enterprising, who are willing to take risks for larger gains.

There has been invested in the construction of railways during this period $1,800,000,000, seeking an average return of 4 per cent interest. There has been invested in the enlargement of old and the building of new manufacturing enterprises $3,300,000,000. There have been loaned to Europe at 3½ and 4 per cent over $50,000,000. Other millions have gone into mines in Mexico, in the different countries of South America, and in exploitations in Asia and Africa.

Never in the history of the world, in any nation, has there been such vast wealth controlled by such energetic, able, and informed capitalists, ready to take up, in this country or abroad, on the land or on the sea, any enterprises which would promise returns. If the contentions of the opponents of this bill are correct, why has it gone into speculative undertakings, into these operations involving risk and loss, into these investments giving such small returns of interest, if American ships could be built and navigated as cheaply as the ships of any other country of the world?

Why, Mr. President, if that proposition was true we would not be here to-day discussing measures for the promotion of the American mercantile marine, nor lamenting the disappearance of American merchant vessels from the ocean and seas of the earth, nor wondering why the United States alone of nations has no place in the maritime calculations of shippers, but we would be rejoicing in the fact that the American flag, now unknown and unseen on almost all of the routes of commerce, was again a familiar sight to the eyes of the American traveler in every port, and the place of the United States among maritime nations was as high as it is among those same nations in competitive industries and in finance.

The eloquent Senator from Missouri characterizes this measure as "class legislation." But never, in any country, has any measure which added to the national defense been regarded as class legislation. The $26,000,000 a year in bounties, or subsidies, or mail contracts, or whatever form it may take, which are paid by European nations, has the double motive of the promotion of commerce and the command of the sea. These ships become auxiliary cruisers. England has fifty such vessels, swift, made of steel, up to every modern requirement and subject at all times to the requisition of the British Government.

Without this auxiliary fleet she would have been practically helpless in the transportation of the 300,000 troops she sent to South Africa. One of the most enlightened and progressive rulers in the Old World is the present Emperor of Germany. All of his powers are bent to the promotion of German interests, the extension of German commerce, the employment of German labor and markets for German productions. Within the last ten years he has brought Germany to practically a unanimous support of the subventions, or mail contracts, or direct subsidies, or rebates upon German railways, which amounts to the same thing, by which the German merchant marine has been rapidly overtaking that of Great Britain. He has built up German shipyards by making it a condition that those ships should be built by German labor and in German yards; he has emancipated the German shipper from dependence upon Great Britain, to which, until within recent years, he was subject.

All these great ships are auxiliary cruisers and part of the German navy. The performance of the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and of the Deutschland across the ocean, surpassing all records, at once receives by proclamation the plaudit of the Emperor and by resolution the plaudit and encouragement of the German Parliament. Not only is direct pay given to encourage this mercantile marine, but indirectly the Government-owned railways of Germany are made to contribute. Both exports and imports passing over the German railways have part of the freight remitted to the steamship in order to increase the earnings of the vessels. In addition to that, Germany has recently inaugurated a system of preferential rates to the German manufacturer upon the German railway for goods exported to the competing markets of the world. This operates in the nature of a bounty to enable the German manufacturer to outbid his competitors or to sustain himself against their activity, energy, and cheaper production.

I read from the Board of Trade Journal of February 20, 1902, a report of the British consul at Hamburg on this subject. He says:

His Majesty's consul-general at Hamburg has forwarded to the foreign office a memorandum on the subject of preferential rates for German iron and steel on German railways, of which the following is a copy:

"It has recently been notified by the German newspapers that from and after January 1, 1902, the rates charged on German railways according to the preferential special 'seaport tariff,' which hitherto were applicable only to German steel and iron destined for oversea exportation to Asiatic ports east of Aden, to Australia, and to islands of the Pacific Ocean, have now been extended and made applicable to German steel and iron destined for oversea exportation to all non-European countries, without exception"—

That includes the United States—

"It is evident that the extension of the advantages accorded by the rates of this preferential tariff to the German steel and iron trade and industries has taken place in view of the comparatively unfavorable position in which those industries (and many others) are placed at present; but it is also probable that once introduced for steel and iron intended for oversea exportation, those rates will become permanent, especially in order to enable the German steel and iron industry to compete with that of the United States of America. The rates in question have, for the above first-described destinations, been in force since 1890, and amount to 2.2 pfennigs per metric ton per kilometer, plus 12 pfennigs for working expenses (in place of 3.5 pfennigs plus 12 charged for iron and steel according to the ordinary tariff rates).

"Up to the present these preferential rates have been chiefly advantageous to the North German Lloyd steamers which run from Germany to the far East and Australia, as they have attracted goods to those destinations. There can be little doubt that the further extension of the advantages offered by these reduced rates will give an impulse toward the oversea export trade of German steel and iron to other countries besides those just named—for instance, to South America."

It gives about 25 per cent of the freight rates to the German manufacturer as a rebate when he exports goods from that which he pays when he sends them locally to the seaboard for local purposes, and that 25 per cent goes into the pockets of the German manufacturer in order to enable him to compete in the American market in spite of our tariff.

Mr. President, I was curiously impressed in finding on investigation that 95 per cent of the American mail is carried mainly in English, German, and French vessels; that all over the world, except for immediate communication between the United States and Europe for certain points, and in this one line that runs via Hawaii to Australia and one Pacific mail steamer running to the Orient, the vast volume of American mails is carried under foreign flags.

Here is the situation which has a side to it that is anything but flattering to American pride. Upon the heads of our postage stamps we have the faces of Franklin, of Washington, of Jackson, of Lincoln, of Grant, of Garfield, of Sherman, of Webster, of Clay, of Jefferson, of Perry, of Madison, and of Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. President, there is a galaxy of patriots, of worthies, of men distinguished in arms, in statesmanship and diplomacy, such as has never been seen before. They were all patriotic Americans; they were all builders of our country; but they can not get their images anywhere in the world except under a British or a German or a French flag. What would be the feelings of George Washington, who had such sentiments hostile to foreign alliances and dependence upon foreign countries, if he knew that his face and figure when carried upon an American letter had to go under a British or a French or a German flag all over the world?

What would be the feeling of General Jackson, rising, as he might, from behind the cotton bales at New Orleans, if he discovered that he was dependent upon the vessels of foreign nations in order to get his features upon an American postal card or an American letter to any part of the world? There would be heard the familiar imprecation from the old hero: "By the Eternal, you degenerate representatives of my principles and party have turned my victory over the British for American independence on the seas into a pitiful surrender to England of the carriage of the mails of our country and the commerce of our people around the earth." This may not be much of an argument, but in any event some tribute ought to be paid to the feelings of these deceased statesmen that their country, now rich and powerful beyond any dreams in which they ever indulged, should not subject their images to such humiliation.

"Class legislation" has been the cry against protection since the organization of our Government. The cleavage upon this question is upon lines as old as the first acts to promote American shipping and to give an impulse to American manufactures in the first term of General Washington. The statesmen to whose genius we owe our institutions saw as clearly a hundred years ago, as Captain Mahan did when he wrote his famous book, that the sea power controls the world. They saw that if the United States was to be capable of sustaining in comfort a population equal to that which its territory invited it must be independent of other countries both on the land and on the sea. They advised the protective measures first for the ocean and then for the land.

By tonnage dues and preferential rates to goods shipped in American vessels they built up an American merchant marine which at one time carried 72 per cent of the foreign commerce of the United States. But the cry of "class legislation," ineffective against protection at home, because protection at home was brought to the door of every citizen, was fatal to our position upon the sea. Upon one pretext and another we made treaties which prevented our continuing these privileges to our citizens. The high tide of opposition to the efforts to equalize our shipping with the shipping of other nations on the ground of "class legislation" was reached when the mail subsidy was withdrawn from the Collins Line, and we retired as a nation from the sea.

The energy and activity of our people, their skill as constructors and sailors, enabled us to hold the sea with our wooden clipper ships for a while, but when the iron ships were substituted the superiority of Great Britain in the manufacture of iron, that industry being in its infancy then with us, gave the monopoly of this construction to England. Now, while we talk of being a world power, with our limitless resources, with our genius for trade and commerce, we carry only 8½ per cent of our own products in American ships under the flag of the United States.

It is the wonder of political economists that Great Britain, with a trade balance against her of about $700,000,000 a year, should remain so rich. The problem which the English statesman has to face is how to feed 42,000,000 of people in the British Isles and furnish them with remunerative industries when the British Isles have to import food for 30,000,000. It is this which makes this enormous balance of trade of $700,000,000 a year against her. If she had to take it out of her capital she would soon be exhausted and impoverished.

The steam tonnage of the world is about 11,000,000 tons, of which Great Britain owns 7,300,000, leaving 3,700,000 for all the rest of the world. The output of new vessels from the British yards is about 1,400,000 tons, against 672,000 tons for all the rest of the world. This vast preponderance of British shipping earns nearly the whole of the balance of trade against her, its earnings being about $700,000,000 a year. Of course, the enormous investment of British capital and the tremendous loans of British money to other nations, which do not appear in the balance of trade, make Great Britain still the creditor nation of the Old World.

But while protection has been withdrawn, in deference to the cry of "class legislation," from the ocean, happily for the United States, fortunately for our people, the policy has been maintained in our internal affairs. I will not go over the old story of the financial cataclysms and industrial paralysis which have followed the interference with this policy at different times during the last century. For forty years this policy of protection to American industries has been practically supreme. In that forty years we have made the phenomenal progress which astonishes no one more than ourselves. There is no lesson so clear, no fact so irrefutable as those based upon the operations of the protective policy in our land. We successfully compete in the open and the opened markets of the Orient; we successfully compete in their own markets with the highly organized industrial nations of the Old World.

The sale of the surplus of our industries abroad prevents the congestion of our labor and keeps it at a scale far higher than that of any other country and constantly advancing. But for the protective policy we would have congestion, paralysis, and suffering upon the land, though we might not reach the condition of absolute poverty which is ours upon the ocean. By the protective policy we are receiving an average of $500,000,000 a year of trade balance in our favor, and then we pay of that about $200,000,000 to foreign shipping to carry American products. If we had upon the ocean an adequate merchant marine, it is difficult to picture the benefit to American labor which would accrue from the employment of this vast sum in our own industries and among our own people.

The great difficulty with our friends upon the other side is the Democratic conscience. It is a conscience which believes every act or policy unconstitutional for which explicit authority can not be found plainly written in the Constitution. For one hundred years it has suffered and been sorely tried. It bobs up serenely in opposition whenever the nation endeavors to do anything which will add to its wealth, greatness, and power, and then becomes elastic when the people will no longer respond to its rigid constructions. It was created by Thomas Jefferson, but was the plague of his life. No proposition so clear was ever presented to a statesman as the acquisition of Louisiana and the control of the Mississippi; but it was against the Democratic conscience which he had just brought into life and made exceedingly virile. Nevertheless, he took in Louisiana, which now contains fifteen of our most prosperous States, and opened the Mississippi to the nation as an American highway, and stepped on that conscience.

When the Democratic President Polk and the Democratic President Pierce and the Democratic President Monroe took territory from Spain and from Mexico and governed them by means which were not recognized in the strict letter of the Constitution the Democratic conscience again received frightful wrenches. But we took the territory and we governed it. The Democratic conscience is opposed to internal improvements by the Government, but Democratic Senators and Members of Congress and Presidents all support them.

The Democratic conscience denounces the river and harbor bill and its appropriations, by which the Government steps within the limits of States and beyond the line of national control of navigable and unnavigable waters, but it votes every time for the old flag and an appropriation. We had before us a few days ago the subject of irrigation. It was clearly "class legislation" upon Democratic arguments and Democratic contention. It was not for the national defense, but for the promotion of the interests of a certain section of the United States and of peoples living exclusively within those jurisdictions.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. DIETRICH. The money received from the sale of public lands is to be used for the reclamation of arid lands belonging to the Government and to be sold to settlers.

Mr. DEPEW. Nevertheless it was contrary to Democratic principles. I voted in favor of it, and I am in favor of it; but all I am speaking of is the difficulty that the Democrats had in voting for it. That difficulty was explained in this way: That it was a beneficent measure? No; they did not say that. That it would develop public lands and make them fit for settlement? No; they did not say that. What they did say was that in the distribution of the unconstitutional river and harbor appropriations these several States and Territories where the arid lands are received no direct benefit, and therefore they should have unconstitutional money in order to even them up. It is not the expense to be incurred under the provisions of this bill, but it is the Democratic conscience—so eleastic for one hundred years, so yielding whenever party necessity requires it—which is fighting this bill.

We will spend during the next year probably $145,000,000 for pensions, $130,000,000 for the Army, $100,000,000 for the Navy, and $133,000,000 on the Post-Office, and yet for this measure, which, if successful, will enormously help, enormously strengthen the American Navy, our highest possible expenditure for the coming year is $800,000. Our highest possible expenditure under the postal clause, over and above receipts, is $2,000,000, and that only when the postal routes all over the world have been opened and in successful operation.

Under the subsidy provision for vessels not receiving mail pay it would be impossible for us to build over 200,000 tons every two years at an expenditure of $30,000,000 and the employment of a vast number of American workingmen. So that the highest expenditure possible, with our mail routes built and our merchant service full—and this will take from five to ten years—would be $7,500,000 a year. The river and harbor bill this year, which will carry nearly $60,000,000, is purely for domestic trade and domestic commerce. There is no doubt of its beneficence.

To establish an ocean mail service which would enable us to earn $4,700,000, which would be $2,000,000 in excess of receipts from the mails, will require 24 new, large, fast ocean mail steamers, aggregating 240,000 gross tons. It would take more than three years and largely increased shipbuilding facilities to construct and place upon the ocean these vessels. The total cost of this number of mail steamers constructed within that period would be nearer forty than thirty-five millions of dollars. It would mean the steady employment of 18,000 men and an expenditure in wages of at least $18,000,000.

In considering the vessels which are to be paid a bounty, as distinct from mail service, and for that bounty to carry the mails free, we find this: That during the calendar year 1900 these subsidy ships, excluding mail steamers, would have earned in the voyages which they made during that year $1,000,000, from which deduct the $200,000 for mails which they carry free, and that would leave the subsidy for the present year $800,000. If this $800,000 should increase in the next few years to the extent of $800,000 more in subsidies, it would be necessary to add 100,000 tons of ocean steamers and 40,000 tons of sail vessels to our mercantile fleet. If this output were doubled and the subsidy doubled, the United States then as a shipbuilding nation would be ahead of Germany.

One of the most significant facts, which illustrates with startling emphasis our poverty upon the ocean, are the statistics gathered by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] upon the relations of the revenues derived through the custom-house service of the United States, and the amounts paid to foreign ships for freight upon American exports. For thirty-one years prior to 1901, the total revenue from customs service received by the United States was $5,999,449,241. During the same period of thirty years there were paid by American farmers, manufacturers and other shippers to foreign ships for carrying American products abroad $5,867,671,350. So that during these three decades the people of the United States have paid to foreign vessels owned by foreign capitalists and sailing under foreign flags for the carrying of American products nearly the whole of the vast sums collected through our protective tariff at the various ports of the country and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

It has been said in the debate that the American Line would receive the whole of this subsidy. I have looked into the matter, and I find that the American Line has only four ships which by any possibility could under this bill receive a penny of this subsidy. Those four ships are now under contract which will not expire for three years, so that during that period they will receive no benefits from this bill. If the American Line does receive benefits from this bill, it must enter into competition with all the capitalists of the country who desire to go into the shipbuilding business and who believe that under this subsidy ships sailing under the American flag will be a profitable investment.

We read in the reports of the consuls in Asia and in Africa that they have not seen an American flag among the crowded shipping of the places to which they are accredited during their terms of service. Our late American minister to Siam says that in going up and down for four years the whole coast of the Orient he never once saw an American flag on a merchant vessel among all the vast fleet which carries the interchanges of that coast. If the expectations of this bill are realized, then for this comparatively small expenditure of $7,100,000 a year this reproach will be removed from American enterprise and American progress.

Then, again, the American flag, floating over American steam and sailing vessels, will be seen in every port of the world. Then, with the American flag and American skipper, will come the American commercial agent and the American financial exchanges, and we can have the methods for that competition in which we believe we should be more successful than any other nation, but which is as yet only a dream and a hope.

The financial expert who rises from the appropriations of a billion dollars a year to be frightened by the expenditures possible under this bill in the coming years must remember that the bill is always subject to repeal and modification and that if abuses occur it will be the fault of American Presidents, American Secretaries of the Treasury, and of commerce, the American Congress, the American people, and the American press.

I am in favor of protection on land and on sea; I am in favor of the improvement of our rivers and harbors; I am in favor of an irrigation system which will make fruitful the waste places of our land; I am in favor of the isthmian canal, built and owned by the United States Goverment, and so, to be entirely consistent, I must be in favor of and the country should be in favor of any measure or any system which will give to us once more the command of the ocean; which will make more valuable the lands redeemed by irrigation and the rivers and harbors improved by legislation; which will make useful to us, as well as to the rest of the world, that great canal which is to connect our eastern with our western coast; which is to give us, if we have a merchant marine, the Pacific as almost an American lake, a leading place in the commerce of the Orient, and the gaining of what we ought to have, and are entitled to, the trade of our sister republics of South America. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No demonstrations of applause or disapprobation are permitted under the rules of the Senate. A repetition will lead to a direction to the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the galleries.

DESTRUCTION OF USELESS PAPERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent at this time to present the report of the Joint Select Committee on the Destruction of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The committee have discharged their duty, and submit a report, and I ask that it may be read. It is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri, from the Joint Select Committee on the Destruction of Useless Papers, submits a report which will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Joint Select Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, appointed on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House of Representatives, to which were referred the reports of the heads of departments, bureaus, etc., in respect to the accumulation therein of old and useless files of papers, which are not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business therein, respectively, and have no permanent value or historical interest, with accompanying statements of the condition and character of such papers, respectfully report to the Senate and House of Representatives, pursuant to an act entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments," approved February 16, 1898, as follows:

Your joint committee have met and carefully and fully examined the said reports so referred to your committee and the statements of the condition and character of such files and papers therein described, and we find and report that the files and papers described in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in Senate Document No. 97, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, dated January 8, 1902; and in H. R. Document No. 397, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, reprinted therein; and in the report of the Secretary of War in H. R. Document No. 243, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, dated December 26, 1900; and in the H. R. Document No. 325, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, being the report of the Postmaster-General, dated January 12, 1901; and in the report of the Secretary of the Interior in H. R. Document No. 273, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, dated December 31, 1900 (with the exception of 60 copies of volume 1, 31 copies of volume 9, and 87 copies of volume 10 of the life and works of John Adams, which we recommend to be transferred and delivered to the Superintendent of Documents, Hon. L. C. Ferrell); and in Senate Document No. 88, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, being the letter of the president of the United States Civil-Service Commission, dated December 2, 1901, are not needed in the transaction of the current business of such departments and bureaus, and have no permanent value or historical interest, and should be sold as waste paper or otherwise disposed of, upon the best obtainable terms as provided by law.

Respectfully submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives.

F. M. COCKRELL,
BOIES PENROSE,
Members on the part of the Senate.

E. S. MINOR,
C. F. CUSHMAN,
Members on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator from Missouri desire to have made of the report?

Mr. COCKRELL. That ends the matter. It authorizes the departments to dispose of the papers. Let the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed and laid on the table. Should it not be agreed to by the Senate?

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no need of that?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just simply a statement for information, so that it may be known. The object is to prevent the destruction of papers that might be valuable without the consent of Congress.

LITTLE KANAWHA RIVER NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is no disposition to proceed further with the discussion of the shipping bill at this time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield for a moment, till I can obtain unanimous consent to call up a very short bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. It is one that was passed over on account of the absence of my colleague from the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 297) for an examination of the property of the Little Kanawha River Navigation Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineers, whose duty it shall be to examine, in all their relations to commerce, the property and appurtenances of the Little Kanawha River Navigation Company, a corporation of West Virginia, with a view to their acquirement by the United States; to consider their value, and all other matters connected with their usefulness to navigation. The said board shall report to the Secretary of War, who shall lay its report before Congress at its next session, together with the views of himself and of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon. And the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not intend to object to the consideration of the bill. Has it been considered by the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. If it has been reported from that committee I shall not object.

Mr. SCOTT. It has been reported by my colleague. While my colleague has been temporarily absent from the Chamber it has come up and been passed over.

Mr. ALLISON. Our experience in buying water powers and canals has not been very successful, but if the Committee on Commerce think this is a wise measure I shall not object to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH B. SARGENT.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut rose.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw my motion until the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] makes known what he desires.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am obliged to be away from the Senate Chamber a good deal on business in connection with the Committee on Indian Affairs. I should like to have taken up at this time by unanimous consent the bill (S. 2393) for the relief of James B. Sargent. We practically reached it on the Calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 4, to strike out the name "James" and insert "Joseph;" and in line 7 to strike out the name "James" and insert "Joseph;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Joseph B. Sargent, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $583.67, the same being the value of property belonging to the said Joseph B. Sargent and illegally seized, and for money improperly and unlawfully collected from him as alleged duties and penalties by United States officials at the port of El Paso, Tex.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Joseph B. Sargent."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SHERMAN, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the senior Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3834) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Sherman, in the State of Texas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 1, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States court-house, post-office, and other Government offices, in the city of Sherman and State of Texas, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN SILVER CURRENCY.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the motion for an executive session immediately, as one of the purposes for which I desired it is not capable of accomplishment to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2210) relating to Hawaiian silver coinage and silver certificates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the silver coins that were coined under the laws of Hawaii, when the same are not mutilated or abraded below the standard of circulation, shall be received at the par of their face value in payment of all dues to the government of the Territory of Hawaii and of the United States, and the same shall not again be put into circulation, but they shall be recoined in the mints as United States coins.

SEC. 2. That when such coins have been received by either Government in sums not less than $500 they shall be deposited as bullion in the mint at San Francisco, Cal., and shall be recoined as subsidiary coinage of the United States. And the superintendent of the said mint shall pay for such coins, at their face value, to the proper officer or agent of the government depositing the same, the sum so deposited, in standard silver coins of the United States. The expenses of transmitting said coins to and from the Hawaiian Islands shall be borne equally by the United States and the government of Hawaii.

SEC. 3. That any collector of customs or of internal revenue of the United States in the Hawaiian Islands shall, if he is so directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, exchange standard silver coins of the United States that are in his custody as such collector with the government of Hawaii, or with any person desiring to make such exchange, for coins of the government of Hawaii, at their face value when the same are not abraded below the lawful standard of circulation, and the Treasurer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to deposit such silver coins of the United States as shall be necessary with the collector of customs or of internal revenue at Honolulu or at any Government depository for the purpose of making such exchange under such regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That any silver coins struck by the government of Hawaii that are mutilated or abraded below such standard may be presented for recoinage at any mint in the United States by the person owning the same, or his or her agents, in sums of not less than $50, and such owner shall be paid for such coins by the superintendent of the mint the bullion value per troy ounce of the fine silver they contain in standard silver coin of the United States, and such bullion shall be coined into subsidiary coinage of the United States.

SEC. 5. That silver coins heretofore struck by the government of Hawaii shall continue to be legal tender for debts in the territory of Hawaii, in accordance with the laws of the republic of Hawaii, until the 1st day of January, 1904, and not afterwards.

SEC. 6. That no seigniorage, or mint dues, or charges shall be made or retained for the recoinage of the silver coins of the government of Hawaii at any mint of the United States under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That any silver certificates heretofore issued by the government of the Hawaiian Islands, intended to be circulated as money, shall be redeemed by the Territorial government of Hawaii on or before the 1st day of January, 1904, and after said date it shall be unlawful to circulate the same as money.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act contained shall bind the United States to redeem any silver certificates issued by the government of Hawaii, or any silver coin issued by such government, except in the manner and upon the conditions stated in this act for the recoinage of Hawaiian silver.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the Secretary read section 2 again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will again be read.

The Secretary again read section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with an amendment, on page 3, line 21, section 7, to strike out the word "four" and insert "five;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That any silver certificates heretofore issued by the government of the Hawaiian Islands intended to be circulated as money shall be redeemed by the Territorial government of Hawaii on or before the 1st day of January, 1905, and after said date it shall be unlawful to circulate the same as money.

Mr. FORAKER. That extends by one year the time during which the silver certificates that may be in circulation can pass as lawful money.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator what is the purpose anyway of making it a crime to circulate those silver certificates if people choose to do it? The people will not take them. I do not see why that should be done?

Mr. FORAKER. The only purpose of this provision is to make more certain the redemption of these silver certificates by the Hawaiian government. There are very few of them in circulation. Most of those issued have already been taken up. There are some few still outstanding, and it is thought that when it is no longer lawful to circulate them they will be brought in and redeemed and a better money will be substituted in their place.

I should perhaps say to the Senate that the aggregate of silver coins in circulation is only about $900,000. It was coined by the government of Hawaii as Hawaiian coins in dollars and half dollars and quarters and dimes, and we simply provide by this bill for substituting our coins in lieu of those coins, the provision being, however, that those coins when taken up shall be recoined as subsidiary coins; that is, shall not be coined into dollars to take the place of the dollars taken up, but coined as half dollars and quarters and dimes, the people needing the subsidiary coins there and not needing the other.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what are the denominations of the coins they have over in Hawaii?

Mr. FORAKER. The denominations are precisely the same as ours.

Mr. TELLER. Have they dollars and halves and quarters?

Mr. FORAKER. There are some dollars and some half dollars and some quarters and some dimes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. At what rate do these coins pass in Hawaii?

Mr. FORAKER. They pass there precisely the same as ours. It is a mere substitution of our coins for their coins, the only difference being that their coins when taken up will be altogether recoined as subsidiary coins.

Mr. TELLER. How will they be paid for?

Mr. FORAKER. We pay for them by our own money as they are taken up. The first provision is that each Government to which payment shall be made of these coins shall have authority to turn them in to the mint as they are received and collected.

Mr. TELLER. In line 2, page 2, section 2, the bill provides:

And the superintendent of the said mint shall pay for such coins, at their face value, to the proper officer or agent of the Government depositing the same, the sum so deposited, in standard silver coins of the United States.

Does the Senator mean by that in standard dollars, or in silver coins?

Mr. FORAKER. In standard silver coins of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. That might possibly be construed to mean dollars instead of standard silver coins. I think if the Senator would say "silver coins"——

Mr. FORAKER. I think the superintendent of the mint may, under this provision, pay in any kind of coin he may see fit to pay in. He may pay in dollars if he sees fit; when it comes to recoining what he has received he shall recoin only in subsidiary coins.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the purpose is to replace that money with American coins.

Mr. FORAKER. Precisely.

Mr. TELLER. We ought to send over to those people some dollars and some 50-cent pieces. I think the word "standard" ought to go out, and let it read:

So deposited, in silver coins of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the word "standard" there simply refer to the purity of the metal?

Mr. TELLER. If that is so, it is not necessary to put it in. We have no coin that is not standard. It might be construed to be "dollars."

Mr. FORAKER. I think that is true; it is a superfluous word; but I did not object to it in the bill. However, I did not myself draft the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The word "standard" is applied to the silver in the silver coin.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to make any suggestion. If the Treasury Department drafted the bill, I suppose they are aware that the people of the islands must have quarters and half dollars, and they will supply them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. CULLOM. I should think the money ought to be paid back in any denominations that the people want.

Mr. TELLER. That is perfectly proper.

Mr. CULLOM. The money over there is stamped as Hawaiian money; and we do not want to have two or three coins circulating as money of the United States. So the arrangement proposed is to have it all recoined in United States money and paid back.

Mr. TELLER. I am not complaining of that. That is a proper thing to do, of course. They can not have any independent money over there any more than the Territory of New Mexico can have it. It is very proper that we should get it into the mint and give it back to them in such coin as the community wants; that is all.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt that that will be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether these silver dollars or fractional coins are coins that have been created in Hawaii?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. And they have the same standard of fineness that our coins have—nine-tenths fine?

Mr. FORAKER. Precisely the same.

Mr. ALLISON. How many of them are there?

Mr. FORAKER. About $900,000 in the aggregate.

Mr. ALLISON. All told?

Mr. FORAKER. All silver.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that include subsidiary silver as well as dollars?

Mr. FORAKER. It includes dollars, half dollars, quarters, and dimes, and the aggregate is about $900,000.

Mr. CULLOM. It was supposed to be a million when we were there.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree that these coins ought to be melted and United States coins substituted. It occurs to me that under section 2 there is perhaps an amount, I do not know how much, that ought to accrue as seigniorage to the United States:

That when such coins have been received by either government in sums not less than $500 they shall be deposited as bullion in the mint at San Francisco, Cal., and shall be recoined as subsidiary coinage of the United States. And the superintendent of the said mint shall pay for such coins, at their face value, to the proper officer or agent of the government depositing the same, the sum so deposited, in standard silver coins of the United States.

There are no standard silver coins that I know of under our law except silver dollars.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I said.

Mr. ALLISON. We recognize two kinds of silver coin in our country, one being what we call standard silver dollars and the other being subsidiary coin.

Mr. TELLER. It is of lighter weight.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Those subsidiary coins are coined according to a statute, and I should suppose it might be said that they were coined according to another standard—that the silver dollar is coined according to one standard and the subsidiary coins are coined according to another standard.

Mr. ALLISON. The subsidiary coins are worth 10 per cent less than our standard coins. Now, these identical coins are to be coined into subsidiary coinage. I do not know precisely why it is that they should be coined into subsidiary coinage and then paid for at the par value of these coins to the government of Hawaii.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to answer, they are to be coined into subsidiary coins, as I understand it, because in Hawaii they do not want any more silver dollars. They seem to have a sufficient proportion for circulation in the aggregate.

Mr. ALLISON. Do they have our silver dollar?

Mr. FORAKER. A great many silver dollars have been taken there and are now in circulation.

Mr. ALLISON. How is it as respects our subsidiary silver?

Mr. FORAKER. They are short of subsidiary coin, and that is the reason why as this coin is taken up they want to have it all recoined into subsidiary coin. They have a need for more subsidiary coins, and they do not have a need, as they think, for more standard silver dollars at this particular time.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that under section 2

it appears to me the government of Hawaii will receive the seigniorage, or profit, which arises from the coinage into subsidiary silver. Now, I think that profit ought to inure to our mints. If we give them back American silver dollars or American subsidiary coin, which we are bound to redeem in gold, they ought to be satisfied without making a profit of 10 per cent, it seems to me; and if this section 2 is correctly interpreted I think that would be the result.

Mr. CULLOM. They are a part of our people.

Mr. ALLISON. They are a part of our people, it is true; but why should we give them the profit instead of giving it to the Mint of the United States? That is the question which occurs to me. So I should think we ought to repay them in silver dollars and let them get our subsidiary coin as other people get it. It is always available to people who want subsidiary silver.

Mr. FORAKER. I am at a loss to clearly understand the Senator from Iowa. If I do understand him, the case is just the opposite of what he presents. We are to take up their standard silver dollars, if I may use that term without being misunderstood, and we are to pay them in our subsidiary coins, which are coined, as the Senator has stated, at 10 per cent less in value proportionately than the standard silver dollars. So the seigniorage would be due to the Hawaiian government instead of to us, as I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. If it be true that we put into our mints these silver dollars and pay them in subsidiary coin, then the Senator is right. If that is the true interpretation of the section, of course I was wrong about it.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the understanding I have of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I call the attention of the Senator to section 6.

Mr. FORAKER. Section 6 is put there simply to avoid any question of the character suggested by the Senator from Iowa. It is a prohibition against the retention of seigniorage or mint dues or charges of any kind on behalf of either government. In other words, it is a transaction that is for the primary benefit of the people in Hawaii, where this coin is to be used, and yet at the same time for our benefit as well as theirs.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, of course this is a matter of no very great consequence, I know, but if the seigniorage was only the cost of coinage that would seem to be all right. However, the seigniorage in this particular case, taking section 2 and section 6 together, is, it seems to me, the seigniorage that we gain by coining fractional silver instead of standard silver dollars. I do not think that section 6 ought to remain there. I should say not.

Mr. TELLER. Nor section 7 either.

Mr. ALLISON. As to section 7, I wish to ask a question, if the Senator will allow me. A silver certificate was issued by the government of the Hawaiian Islands. I wish to know if those silver certificates so issued are now in circulation?

Mr. FORAKER. They are in circulation, but only to a very limited extent.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there not a silver dollar somewhere against them?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; there is a silver dollar on deposit in the treasury of the Hawaiian government with which to redeem the silver certificate that is outstanding. Under the law authorizing the issuing of the silver certificates there was a provision made for their redemption by the Hawaiian government. We do not interfere with that at all.

Mr. ALLISON. That is going on?

Mr. FORAKER. That is going on; and the silver certificates are circulating in the meanwhile. The only provision we make on that point is one calculated to hurry up the redemption of them by saying that after the 1st day of January, 1905, they shall no longer circulate as money.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there will be any trouble about it. I would suggest that section 6 be stricken out. I think there is no objection to section 7.

Mr. FORAKER. I had nothing to do with the preparation of this bill, but the drafter of it, I understand, prepared it in its present form after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not strike out of section 6 the words "retained for the recoinage of the silver coins," because we turn back the equivalent of them? We make no charge for recoining the standard silver dollar, because we give back the same quantity of them that there was.

Mr. ALLISON. If there are fractional silver coins there, I see no reason why we should not, at our own expense, recoin those fractional silver coins; but the question of seigniorage should not enter into the matter at all, as it appears to me.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that in the Porto Rican case we dealt with a similar generosity to that which is now suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, but——

Mr. FORAKER. We did that without complaint. Everybody thought it was a very proper thing to give them a safe margin. The number of dollars that will be paid in to be recoined I do not know. It can not be any very considerable amount. The seigniorage can not be any very large sum. All that was no doubt considered by the Secretary of the Treasury and those who drafted the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The Porto Rican matter presented a very different situation.

Mr. FORAKER. It was different in some respects.

Mr. ALLISON. We paid them, I understand, more than their silver coins were worth in bullion.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. We did that because our Army officers had fixed the value of those coins at 60 cents when they were worth only 50 cents. But I do not know of anything which requires us now to deal with Hawaii as we then dealt with Porto Rico.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Ohio this fact. The bulk of the coin that we exchange and get from Hawaii is subsidiary coinage, as I understand it.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. It is of the same fineness as our subsidiary coins?

Mr. FORAKER. It is just the same.

Mr. NELSON. In respect to that the question of seigniorage can not arise. It can only arise so far as relates to the silver dollars of Hawaii. If we take them and coin them into silver dollars there is a little seigniorage; but in respect to the subsidiary coin that question can not arise. As I understand it, there is only a limited amount of silver dollars. Most of the Hawaiian silver is subsidiary silver; so there can be no question of seigniorage in respect to that. The fineness of one coin is equivalent to the fineness of the other.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator from Minnesota for reenforcing my argument. Therefore I suggest that section 6 be stricken out.

Mr. FORAKER. Is that made in the form of an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I will move it as a formal amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator makes it, I wish to suggest that we might meet the objection he offers by providing here that "no seigniorage or mint dues or charges shall be made or retained for the coinage of any coins except the standard silver dollar." But that provision would be against the United States instead of in favor of the United States, because a provision of the bill is that all that we take up is to be coined into subsidiary coins. So we can not lose anything in any event. We are going to pay in our depreciated coin (if I may use that expression without being misunderstood) for the coin that we gather in from Hawaii.

Now, inasmuch as it is indefinite to what extent there will be any seigniorage, I hope the Senator will not insist upon his amendment, but let it go as it is, because our Government is certainly not losing anything, in so far as there is not any seigniorage at all, if the measure stands in its present shape. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. We are not losing anything of course.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if this question is settled, I want to make what I think is a correction in the bill. Section 2 contains this provision:

> The expenses of transmitting said coins to and from the Hawaiian Islands shall be borne equally by the United States and the government of Hawaii.

There is not any government of that character in existence that I know of.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a Territory now.

Mr. TELLER. It went out of existence when it became a Territory of the United States. In another place in the bill it is properly treated as a Territorial government.

Mr. FORAKER. It ought to read "the Territorial government of Hawaii."

Mr. TELLER. That is what ought to be there. It is all right in the first section, where the bill speaks of dues to the government of the Territory. I think in another place perhaps the correction ought to be made. In section 5 it is all right. It is "Territory of Hawaii" there.

Mr. FORAKER. In section 6 it should read "the Territorial government of Hawaii."

Mr. TELLER. Yes. In the next section it refers to what the original Territory did, and that is all right enough. In section 8 it says, "Certificates issued by the government of Hawaii," and that is right. It was the former government that issued the certificates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado proposes two amendments.

Mr. TELLER. I want simply to correct the text by saying "the Territorial government of Hawaii" instead of "the government of Hawaii."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment accepted?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I understand that on motion of the Senator from Colorado the word "Territorial" will be inserted before the word "government" in line 8 on page 2, and also before the word "government" in section 6.

Mr. TELLER, Let it read "Territorial government" in line 8 on page 2 and in section 6, line 15 on page 3. Those corrections I want to have made. In a part of the bill it is all right and in a part it was not.

Mr. FORAKER. I accept those amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I know no reason why we should take in these coins and appropriate money for recoining them when the cost of recoining can be paid out of what we usually call seigniorage. If the Senator thinks, and if it is the best judgment of the Senate, that we are under some obligation to recoin all these coins at the expense of the United States, I shall not oppose it any further.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know much about these matetrs, but I should like to inquire what is our obligation. This is, of course, in the nature of a debt of Hawaii to keep good the coins there. Now, what is our obligation for the debt? Does it not come under our obligation to the Hawaiian debt?

Mr. FORAKER. Answering the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that this is not in the nature of a debt obligation. It is simply a bill providing for the retirement of the Hawaiian silver coins now in circulation in Hawaii, coins that were coined by the Hawaiian government.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it.

Mr. FORAKER. They are marked Hawaiian coins, and the provision is that those coins shall be received at their face value in payment of dues to both the Hawaiian government and to our Government, and that in sums of not less than $500 they may be turned over to the superintendent of the mint at San Francisco for coinage——

Mr. HOAR. I understand that.

Mr. FORAKER. And that they shall be recoined into subsidiary coin.

Mr. HOAR. But I understand the Senator from Iowa inquired why it was that in recoining the Hawaiian coins, as this bill provides, the burden of seigniorage on the recoinage should fall on the United States, upon which my question was, saying that I did not know much about it, and I do not, whether it was not required that we should assume it and not have the holder of the coinage assume it, because we had undertaken on examination to be responsible for the indebtedness of Hawaii, and that, though not a bonded debt, it still is a Government obligation. That was the question I put.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, the question is simply this. Here are silver coins in Hawaii, standard silver and subsidiary silver. I am repeating, I know, what I said. It is the purpose of this bill to substitute for those coins coins of the United States. In that substitution the bill provides that these Hawaiian coins shall be coined into subsidiary silver. If they are so coined, they will get 10 per cent more dollars than they have now.

Mr. HOAR. Why?

Mr. ALLISON. Because the subsidiary silver is worth 10 per cent less—that is, 10 per cent less silver is in them than in the standard coin. Now, then, if we give them more dollars than we take of them, which we are bound to do if we coin this bullion into subsidiary silver, we are not paying for this coin, but at the expense of the United States Government we give them 10 per cent more dollars than they give us.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose these were subsidiary coins of the United States and they had become worn or degenerate for any reason whatever, we should in some way give to a man who brought them to the mint other subsidiary coins at their face value, without any regard to what was the value of the metal in them, as an obligation of the Government. You would not let a man with a worn-out quarter of a dollar or a worn-out nickel that got so bad it could not pass any longer lose that subsidiary coin. You would give him a new one or something equivalent in value to its face value.

Now, is not that just what this bill is doing for the Hawaiian coinage, and nothing else? If we do it as an obligation of the Government to the citizens of the United States, ought we not to do exactly the same thing as an obligation of the Government, having assumed the government of Hawaii and its indebtedness of all kinds? Is it doing anything more for them than we do for our own citizens with our own coin? That is the question.

Mr. CULLOM. They are now our citizens.

Mr. HOAR. They are now our citizens.

Mr. ALLISON. If these coins are a debt and we are bound to pay them in gold, then I agree with the Senator. If they are not, then the question I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts, is whether we are bound to take a silver dollar from a citizen and coin it into four quarters and give him a 10-cent piece besides for his dollar, or whether it is not enough for us to give the man four quarters for his dollar, coining it at our own expense, leaving that 10-cent piece, if there be one, in the Treasury itself. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HOAR. I agree that if you give him the actual current value of that he brings to you you have done all you ought to do.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa says that is all there is about it. Truly he has got it wrong end foremost. There is not anything about it that he has stated. We do not take the silver dollar and coin it into subsidiary coin and give a man 10 per cent for the operation in addition to the full value, but we charge him, and take from him 10 cents. It is just the opposite.

Mr. TELLER. We give him two half dollars.

Mr. FORAKER. We give him two half dollars or four quarters, worth only 90 cents, as compared with the standard silver dollar. We take the standard silver dollar that is worth 100 cents, and we give him back four quarters or two half dollars, whichever we may see fit, in full payment. In other words, we make 10 cents by the transaction. Now, if anybody has a right to complain it is the Hawaiians.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, that is a very beautiful story, half told. When we issue United States quarter dollars we agree by our law to redeem those quarters in gold. When we give him four quarters we give him exactly what he had, except that we do what we do not do in the case of our standard dollar when he brings those four quarters to our Treasury. We give him a gold dollar for it. Therefore, in theory, according to the Senator from Ohio, we have substituted a better currency for this standard dollar. So we are now, at our own expense, coining these four quarters and giving him 10 cents for the difference. He ought to be satisfied if we will give him the same kind of money that we take from him and pay the cost of doing it. That is my criticism. It is a matter of no moment to me, except that when Senators say I do not understand it I simply make the suggestion.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator will not find in the RECORD any statement from me to the effect that he does not understand it. If there is anybody who understands what he is talking about in the Senate it is the Senator from Iowa. He always knows what he is talking about, except when he gets on the wrong side. [Laughter.] That does happen once in a while. I appreciate fully the point he has made here, but the trouble about it is that it has no application to this case. We have not been discussing anything about the effect of substituting silver coin to be redeemed in gold for silver coins that are not redeemable. That is a new proposition altogether.

These coins are circulating in Hawaii on a par with our silver coins. There is no distinction whatever between Hawaiian coins and United States coins as they are in circulation in Hawaii today. Their payment is guaranteed and they circulate at their full value, just as though they also were specifically made redeemable in gold, as the Senator suggests ours are.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I will give a statement from the report of the Hawaiian Commission as to what this money consists of:

THE HAWAIIAN CURRENCY.

The gold coins of the United States are the only unlimited legal tender. (Civil laws, sec. 665.)

Hawaiian silver coins are legal tender for amounts not exceeding $10. United States dimes and half dimes are also legal tender in limited amounts. (Civil laws, secs. 666 and 667.)

COINAGE.

During the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 the following Hawaiian coins were put in circulation, having theretofore been coined at the United States mint in San Francisco (Biennial Report Minister of Finance, 1890, p. 7):

Dollars	500,000
Halves	350,000
Quarters	125,000
Dimes	25,000

This is the only Hawaiian coinage ever executed.

That is the character of silver money those people had when the commission was there.

Mr. TELLER. That was coined in San Francisco?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

PAPER CURRENCY.

By session laws 1895, act 19 (civil laws, secs. 672-675), the minister of finance was authorized to issue gold and silver certificates of deposit upon setting aside sufficient of the respective coins for the payment of such certificates. The act also provided for the retirement of all outstanding certificates of deposit.

Under this authority certificates of deposit have been issued to the amount of $272,500, for the redemption of which silver coin is now held in the Treasury. These certificates have been issued in the following denominations:

5 dollars	$12,500
10 dollars	35,000
20 dollars	50,000
50 dollars	75,000
100 dollars	100,000

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Illinois for giving us the information which he has just imparted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. What has become of my amendment to strike out section 6?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware that the Senator had offered an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will offer it now.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to add another remark, if the President of the Senate and the Senator from Iowa will allow me.

Since the accurate information which has been given us by the Senator from Illinois we know that there were coined originally 500,000 of these standard silver dollars. No one knows how many of them are still in circulation, and no one knows how many of them will be brought in for redemption. It was estimated that there were 1,000,000 silver dollars in the aggregate originally coined in subsidiary coin. There is not now probably more than $900,000 in circulation, but assuming that the whole 500,000 silver dollars will be brought in to be recoined, we would make by the transaction, if the bill stands as it is now worded, $50,000, or 10 per cent, on all standard silver dollars that will be recoined—that is, the bill provides that for these silver dollars we shall substitute subsidiary coins, which are said to be 10 per cent less in value.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Ohio is a little off in that statement. If we get, say, $500 in silver dollars and coin it into half dollars, we would have 10 per cent more. I think section 6 means that Hawaii shall get the entire amount of coinage; otherwise, what was the use of putting in the bill this language:

SEC. 6. That no seigniorage, or mint dues, or charges shall be made or retained for the recoinage of the silver coins of the government of Hawaii at any mint of the United States under the provisions of this act.

It seems to me that with section 6 in the bill the Hawaiians do get the seigniorage.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I am very much obliged to him for suggesting that construction of the language. I think he is correct about it, and that is, perhaps, exactly what the drafter of this bill intended, that in issuing subsidiary silver coinage as standard silver coins there should be no mint charges, but there should be issued the equivalent of such coin. Taking the other view of it, the one suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], if the view suggested by the Senator from Iowa be the true one, we are not losing but making by the transaction. If the view suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] be the true one, neither party is making anything, but there is an exactly fair exchange of this coin. I think we can very well afford either interpretation of the law, and I hope the bill will be allowed to stand.

Mr. TELLER. Those people are now just as much citizens of the United States as are the people of the District of Columbia or those of any section of the country, and I think we are under the same obligation to them. If coins of the United States in use there have become worn, so that they are not current, or if the money is not of good character, we should recoin it. We do not in this country make the party who holds a dollar when it is worn out bear the loss, but we have a system of taking that money and recoining it, and the Government and not the citizen loses the wastage.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, unless they get below the standard.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; we recoin them unless they get below the standard prescribed by the statute. These coins are not such as we want in circulation, and we take them up. I do not see why we should not extend the same advantages to those people as we extend to all other people in this country.

Mr. CULLOM. I certainly do hope that the people of Hawaii will not be discriminated against in this matter. They should be treated the same as all the rest of our people.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely want to call attention to these two sections taken together, and they are ingeniously drawn, to say the least. The first section provides:

That the silver coins that were coined under the laws of Hawaii, when the same are not mutilated or abraded below the standard of circulation, shall be received at the par of their face value in payment of all dues to the government of the Territory of Hawaii and of the United States, and the same shall not again be put into circulation, but they shall be recoined in the mints as United States coins.

Those coins are now receivable by the government of Hawaii and by the Government of the United States. Then section 2 provides:

That when such coins have been received by either government—

That is, by the government of Hawaii or the Government of the United States—in sums not less than $500 they shall be deposited as bullion in the mint at San Francisco, Cal., and shall be recoined as subsidiary coinage of the United States. And the superintendent of the said mint shall pay for such coins, at their face value, to the proper officer or agent of the Government depositing the same, the sum so deposited, in standard silver coins of the United States.

The point I raise in relation to section 2 is this: These coins when deposited as bullion in the mint are required to be recoined into subsidiary coinage. Then should not that bullion be coined into so many sudsidiary coins at our standard of subsidiary coinage as would make an equivalent in fractional currency?

Mr. TELLER. I think so.

Mr. ALLISON. In other words, if $500, as is proposed here, of standard coins are deposited in the mint of San Francisco, they are to be recoined as subsidiary coinage of the United States. Is it to be $500 in subsidiary coin, or is it to be received as bullion? That would make more than $500 in fractional silver.

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the Senator what I think that means.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. A silver dollar contains 412½ grains of silver, 900 fine, and I suppose if it is melted up it will be, of course, in the same relative proportion. When you take two half dollars out you have 384 grains. The difference between that and 412½ grains is what the Senator is calling "the seigniorage."

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. But it is the property of the Hawaiian people and, it seems to me, it ought to be put into coin for those people and not put into the Treasury of the United States. We lose nothing except the bare cost of recoining it, which is 75 per cent on a hundred.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that perfectly well. I think, as I stated in the beginning, that this matter is not worth a great deal of controversy. My only point is that we are proposing to make a recoinage here of all the coins in Hawaii, and we are proposing to give the Hawaiians 10 per cent upon those coins. While it is a small matter to us, we are proposing to give them that percentage in coin. We lose nothing by it in one sense, of course, but we coin it for nothing, whilst in any other case of subsidiary coinage we coin the silver, taking ourselves the seigniorage. If Senators desire to make a present to those people, I shall not object to it. The sentiment seems to be that we ought to give Hawaii $90,000 as a present in addition to recoining these coins at our own expense. If that is the sentiment of the Senate, I shall offer no amendment to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Nothing of the kind is proposed to be done. We do not give to the people of Hawaii $90,000 or any other sum, but we coin their silver, figuring it at 192 grains to a half dollar, and I suppose when we coin two half dollars it cost a little more than it would cost to coin one silver dollar.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. There are 412½ grains of silver in the standard silver dollar.

Mr. TELLER. If not worn too much.

Mr. ALLISON. There are 384 grains of silver in two half dollars. Therefore there are 28½ grains of silver somewhere which belong to somebody. Who shall have it? We are giving back to the people of Hawaii substantially the same dollar in two halves that we took from them. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and I will ask him this question: If we take from the Hawaiians a dollar and coin it into two half dollars, do we not give back to them as much in the way of currency and coin as we took from them?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the Senator's view upon that particular question.

Mr. HOAR. I am going to tell you that, but I am going to state it in my own way, because there may be something in the particular phrase of the honorable Senator of which I do not see the full application. I am rather diffident of expressing my opinion in the presence of the wise men who deal with these great questions, but as we all have got to vote upon this matter, I should like to understand it.

When this first section goes into effect there will be a lot of men in Hawaii who have got half dollars or quarter dollars or dollars, or whatever they are, in their pockets, which are worth so much for the purposes of currency, in buying goods and paying debts, because they are legal tender.

Mr. ALLISON. They are receivable for all dues.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Those people give those coins to the Government of the United States, and they get something back of exactly the same value for the same purpose. Now, absolute justice has been done——

Mr. ALLISON. To them.

Mr. HOAR. To that people. The Hawaiian government is expected to receive some of these coins, and we shall have some paid directly to us. The Hawaiian government then gets into its treasury a lot of half dollars or quarter dollars or whatever the coins may be——

Mr. ALLISON. Or dollars.

Mr. HOAR. Or dollars, which they can pay out and expend for the payment of men for working on the roads or anything else, and for what they have got they got the exact value, no more and no less, and when this coin is deposited they are entitled to get the exact value from the United States Government, no more and no less.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. So we have done absolute justice to all concerned, because they have got just what they had before in value, and we have paid them what is exactly the equivalent in value to what they had before, and we have got it now.

Now, what becomes of it after that time? These two parties having been dismissed with absolute justice—the government of Hawaii and the Hawaiian people—it is the business of the United States, and it ought to be the business of the United States, if there is any loss by that transaction, as we now are the Government for all purposes of currency in Hawaii—and Hawaii has gone out of the business of government—if there is any loss in such a performance we ought to bear it, just as we should with our own citizens, and if there is any gain in such a performance we ought to get it, because nobody on earth has any right to complain when we are only doing what is the absolute duty of the Government. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator is precisely right.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then I hope the Senator will vote in the same way I shall.

Mr. ALLISON. I want now to show that the Senator is right, so that other Senators will follow him and me in this vote.

I inquired of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] what would become of this 28¼ grains of silver that had not been used in recoining these dollars into half dollars. Will it go into the Treasury of the United States, where it ought to go? But if I construe aright section 6, it will not go into the Treasury of the United States. Of course all that is paid into the Treasury will go to the Government of the United States, but the portion of it which is paid to the government of Hawaii will go into the Hawaiian treasury; otherwise the circumlocution that we find here would not be found to be necessary in the framing of this bill.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. This bill proposes to pay a dollar for four quarters or a dollar for two halves?

Mr. ALLISON. That is not what it proposes. Of course, if it proposed that there would be no difficulty, but it proposes that this coin turned over by the government of Hawaii shall be coined into subsidiary coinage.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. If we coin $500 of bullion into quarters or halves, it will make more than $500, will it not?

Mr. ALLISON. Five hundred and fifty dollars in round numbers.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Then this bill proposes to pay $550 for $500?

Mr. ALLISON. I think, taking the two sections together, the bill is intended to accomplish just that purpose. I want the bill framed so that it can not be so construed; but it seems that I am all wrong about it. So I leave the question now to Senators who want to give to the Hawaiians the seigniorage which will arise from this process.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Iowa to offer an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I do. I offer an amendment to strike out section 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. That no seigniorage, or mint dues, or charges shall be made or retained for the recoinage of the silver coins of the government of Hawaii at any mint of the United States under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" have it.

Mr. FORAKER. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio insist on his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. FORAKER. I will withdraw the demand, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I can not myself see what earthly difference it makes whether the section is in or out of the bill. I can not see the slightest use of it.

Mr. FORAKER. There may not be, but I am still clearly of the opinion that the Senate has voted under an absolute misapprehension. Of course I have not any right, perhaps, to say that, in view of what has been said; but I do say it, for it is as clear a misapprehension as ever was impressed on a legislative body.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to suggest a compromise?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate seems to be out of order.

Mr. FORAKER. It is out of order and can not proceed, I recognize, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest a compromise between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in section 6, on page 3, line 13, by striking out the words "seigniorage or;" so as to read:

SEC. 6. That no mint dues or charges shall be made or retained for the recoinage of the silver coins of the government of Hawaii at any mint of the United States under the provisions of this act.

I think that will accomplish the object and be fair.

Mr. FORAKER. The whole section has been stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. FORAKER. There was an amendment, on page 3, recommended by the committee. Has that been acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has been agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAM ACROSS RAINY RIVER.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3375) relating to the construction of a dam across Rainy River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in section 2, page 2, line 4, after the word "and," to strike out "for the purpose of improving the navigation of Rainy Lake;" in line 9, after the word "will," to strike out "in the judgment of the Secretary of War," and in line 12, after the word "stream," to insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as relieving the Koochiching Company, its successors or assigns, from liability for any damage inflicted upon private property by reason of the raising of the waters of the lake as aforesaid.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the construction of a dam across the Rainy River by the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, as provided by chapter 238 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large and chapter 346 of volume 31 of the Statutes at Large, is hereby extended to May 4, 1907.

SEC. 2. That the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain said dam, subject to the terms of said chapter 238 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large, upon the plans now on file with the Secretary of War, or any modification of said plans which the Secretary of War may approve; and the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct such dam at such height as will raise the waters of Rainy Lake to high-water mark: Provided, That said dam shall be furnished with such openings or gates or waste ways as will carry the waters of the river at flood stage without raising the water higher than it would rise in the natural condition of the stream: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as relieving the Koochiching Company, its successors or assigns, from liability for any damage inflicted upon private property by reason of the raising of the waters of the lake as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1510) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Charlottesville, Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates not to exceed $100,000 to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings, a site for a building to be erected thereon, and to cause to be erected at Charlottesville, Va., a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, revenue office, post-office, and other Government offices in that city, with fireproof vaults extending to each story; the building thereon to be completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AIDS TO GENERAL OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 3400) to amend section 1098 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 9, after the word "captains," to insert "or lieutenants;" and in the same line, after the words "of the," to strike out "line" and insert "Army;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1098 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Each major-general shall have three aids, who may be selected by him from captains or lieutenants of the Army, and each brigadier-general shall have two aids, who may be selected by him from captains or lieutenants of the Army."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPRAISERS AT PHILADELPHIA AND BOSTON.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4139) to diminish the number of appraisers at the ports of Philadelphia and Boston.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that hereafter there shall be one appraiser of merchandise at each of the ports named, instead of two, at a salary of $5,000 each per annum, instead of $3,000 each.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH L. W. BAILEY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 2388) for the relief of Elizabeth L. W. Bailey, administratrix of the estate of Davis W. Bailey, deceased.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let a part of the report in the case be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 10th instant, which is as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2388) for the relief of Elizabeth L. W. Bailey, administratrix of the estate of Davis W. Bailey, deceased, have examined the same and report:

In 1883 Davis W. Bailey instituted a suit at law against the District of Columbia in the supreme court of the District to recover damages in the sum of $25,000 for an alleged breach of contract, for laying and resurfacing asphalt pavement, and for extra work done under said contract in Washington, D. C.

In 1885, upon the death of Contractor Bailey, his widow, as his administratrix, was, by order of the court, made plaintiff in his place in said action, and is now the beneficiary named in the bill under consideration.

In 1892 the plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to submit the pending case to arbitration, and the parties in interest chose J. J. Johnson, a member of the District bar, as their arbitrator to hear and determine all matters at issue in said case and to make a final award thereon.

Thereupon the said arbitrator entered upon his duties, gave the parties to the cause a full and fair hearing, and made a written award in which he found that there was due from the District of Columbia to the plaintiff, on account of the contract which formed the basis of the case, the sum of $10,519.20.

Following the filing of this award the District contested the same, and in March, 1893, the plaintiff, relying in good faith upon the agreement that the submission of the pending case by the litigants to Johnson was to be a finality, and believing that the award operated as a discontinuance of the pending case, brought suit direct against the District in the supreme court of the District to enforce the award. To this suit the defendant District pleaded that there never had been any agreement to submit to final arbitration the matters in dispute in the suit upon the contract, and that therefore there never had been an award.

Upon this issue the suit upon the award was, in January, 1896, brought to trial in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, before Justice McComas and a jury, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the said sum of $10,519.20, with interest from the date of filing the award, to wit, the 18th day of July, 1892.

From the judgment entered upon this verdict the defendant District appealed to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and the court of appeals affirmed the judgment. (See 9 Appeal Cases, D. C., 380.)

From this judgment the defendant District appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment upon the sole and technical ground that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, under the act of June 11, 1878, which may be termed the charter of the District, were without authority to agree to submit a matter in controversy to the final award of an arbitrator.

The Supreme Court did not in any way pass upon the merits of the case. (See 171 U. S., 161.)

This statement of facts is based upon the judicial records in the cases and upon the following letter from the chairman of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, Hon. B. F. Macfarland, under date of August 7, 1901:

In the matter of the claim of Elizabeth W. Bailey.

This is a claim for compensation for extra work and damages under a contract between the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Bailey French Paving Company dated July 30, 1879, to resurface with asphaltum pavement certain streets in the city of Washington.

Davis W. Bailey was the general agent of said company and claimed to be said company in fact. He instituted an action at law in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against said District for damages, etc., growing out of said contract. On June 19, 1883, Bailey died, but the action was revived in the name of his widow, who was appointed administratrix.

On January 11, 1892, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia appointed J. J. Johnson referee in the case.

The referee reported $10,518.20 due the claimant, and that report became the subject of a suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in which judgment for said amount was rendered. The action of that court was sustained by the court of appeals, but the decision of the court of appeals was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the technical ground that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia had not the power to bind the District by common-law submission of the pending suit for breach of contract to a referee.

There is nothing in the papers to lead the Commissioners to infer that the supreme court of the District and the court of appeals did not thoroughly consider the merits of the claim before affirming the referee's award. Neither have the Commissioners at their command any facts bearing on the case that were not accessible to those tribunals, and it might be presumptuous in them to review their proceedings, especially in view of the lapse of time and the absence of any new testimony in the matter. It therefore seems that if Congress should not deem the judgments of the supreme court of the District and of the court of appeals conclusive as to this claim, it should be referred to the United States Court of Claims.

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
Commissioner.

Upon this statement of facts your committee find:

That the suit upon the contract was actually submitted to final arbitration by both the plaintiff Bailey and the defendant District, and that both parties would have been bound by the award but for the technical limitation of authority found by the United States Supreme Court in the final decision to exist in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to submit any case to arbitration.

That no claim is anywhere made in this matter impeaching the integrity of the award or the competency or honesty of the arbitrator, Johnson, who was a member of the bar of the District of Columbia and a commissioner of the supreme court of the District.

That all the testimony that the District of Columbia had or has was submitted to the arbitrator upon the hearings before him.

That the United States Supreme Court did not pass upon the merits of the controversy, but reversed the judgment upon the award upon the sole ground that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia were without authority under the act of June 11, 1878, to submit the matter in controversy to the final award of an arbitrator. (See 171 U. S., 161.)

That because the Commissioners of the District of Columbia erred in the assumption of authority in the submission of the matter to an arbitrator is no good reason why the plaintiff, who acted in good faith, and who duly established the merits of her case before a competent arbitrator and before court and jury of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, should be deprived of her rights thereby.

Your committee regard this case as one especially calling for and meriting Congressional relief, and therefore report the bill back with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY BADGES.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 57) relating to military badges.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the distinctive badges adopted by military societies of men who served in the armies and navies of the United States during the Chinese relief expedition of 1900 may be worn upon all occasions of ceremony by officers and men of the Army and Navy of the United States who are members of such organization in their own right.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 13, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report to the House.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Superindent of Documents be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the library of the House, for use in said library, 25 copies of volume No. 27 of the United States Statutes at Large.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CLERK, UNITED STATES COURT, WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 184), to establish and provide for a clerk for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at Wilmington, N. C., as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3, chapter 282, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 17, be amended by adding thereto, at the end of said section, the following:

"And the circuit and district judges for the eastern district shall appoint, besides a clerk of said court held at Raleigh, an additional clerk, who shall reside and keep his office at Wilmington and be clerk both of the district and circuit court held at Wilmington, and who shall have the custody and control of the records of said courts, shall give the same bond required of circuit and district courts of said district, and shall receive the same fees and compensation for services performed by clerks of such courts now fixed by law."

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, was read:

On page 2, in line 1, after the word "required," insert the words "of the clerk."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill (H. R. 11354), with Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the features of this bill. It will be remembered that on Monday I arose to a question of privilege, and when my privileged question was stated it was held by the Speaker not to be a question of privilege. I desire, therefore, to take up what I intended to state as a matter of privilege at this time. In order that the House may understand exactly what I wish to bring before it, it will be necessary to make some preliminary statements. It will be remembered by the members of the House that a bill was brought in here and favorably reported to create a permanent Census Bureau. The bill was very short, had but few details, but reenacted the law in existence, modifying it only by repealing such parts as were inconsistent. There was considerable discussion, and it was made manifest in that discussion that the desire of this House was that the employees of the Census Bureau who had been in service from the day they were appointed to that time should be covered into the classified service and placed upon the eligible list and made subject to transfer.

A motion to recommit the bill with instructions was made. A part of the instructions were that the employees of the Census Office should be placed in the civil service. In my remarks I will give the exact motion to recommit. The bill was brought into this House as reported under instructions, with the following section in it:

SEC. 5. That all employees of the Twelfth Census Office at the date of the passage of this act above the grade of skilled laborer shall be, and they are hereby, placed under the provisions of the civil-service act approved January 16, 1883, and the amendments thereto and the rules established thereunder; and all new appointments in the Census Office hereby created shall be made in accordance with the requirements of the civil-service act above referred to.

The bill was passed with the clause exactly as contained in the bill and reported by the committee. After it was passed it went to the Senate, and was reported over there and passed exactly as I now read it. Section 5 was passed in the Senate retaining every word that was in the bill passed by the House and added simply this—or rather struck out and added—as follows: Line 25, of page 3, the word "twelfth" was stricken out by the Senate, and in line 1, page 4, the words "above the grade of" were stricken out; in line 2 the words "skilled laborer" were stricken out. These were all the words of the House section that were stricken out. In the Senate were added after the words "of this act," in line 1, page 4, the words "except unskilled laborer, holding positions which are classified in other departments of the Government." Then, at the end of line 4 and at the beginning of line 5, these words were added, "without further examination." Then, after the word "thereunder," in line 8, this provision was added by the Senate, "and persons who have served as soldiers in any war in which the United States may have been engaged, and the widows of soldiers, shall have preference in the matter of certification;" and in line 11, after the word "appointments," the words "to the clerical force" were inserted.

These were all the additions to section 5 as it passed the House; not a word in the amendment changed in any manner the object, purpose, or aim of section 5. Not a word of the Senate amendment had any effect whatever, except to make it more specific and more definite, with the exception of that added of giving soldiers the preference, which was not inconsistent with the chief object and purpose of the section. The Senate made other amendments. The bill, as amended by the Senate, came over to the House, and the Senate amendments were nonconcurred in. The bill went to conference. The conferees made a report. It was brought to this House, members of the House will remember, on Friday, the day set apart under the rules for the consideration of private pension bills.

Mr. BOUTELL. What day of the month was that?

Mr. SIMS. The day of the month was February 28, as I now remember.

It was brought here when the Committee of the Whole was in session. The committee rose. We all know that on those days set apart for the consideration of private pension bills there is a great hurry, there is a great rush, in order to get as many considered and acted upon as possible, because they can not be considered and acted upon on any other day. Therefore any other business which would seriously interfere with the consideration of private pension bills would be objected to and not meet with favor from members of the House; and therefore any action questioning this conference report or going into details would have met with disfavor, and, as gentlemen also remember, few members are usually present on pension days. The committee rose. The report was sent to the desk by the chairman of the Select Committee on the Census, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who made this statement:

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on House bill 10908. I ask that the statement of the House conferees may be read in lieu of the report.

What reason did the distinguished chairman give for asking that the statement be read instead of the report?

A MEMBER. What page are you reading from?

Mr. SIMS. I am reading from page 2256 of the RECORD:

The statement covers the question fully.

That was the statement of the chairman.

"The statement covers the question fully." Did we have the right to rely on that statement? Most assuredly we did. Therefore no objection was made to the report not being read. The statement was read.

Mr. LOUD. Is the report printed in full as well as the statement?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and I am going to read it in order that the House may see that the statement was not full as to section 5 in the report; and I will read the section from the report, and ask your close attention. Section 5 of the report of the conferees reads thus—after speaking of the other amendment, it says:

Strike out all of the amended section and insert in lieu thereof the following—

The amended section was section 5, which I have read. The report says strike it all out, and then this follows:

SEC. 5. That all employees of the Census Office at the date of the passage of this act, except unskilled laborers, may be appointed by the Director of the Census, with the approval of the head of the Department to which said Census Office is attached, and when so appointed shall be, and they are hereby, placed, without further examination, under the provisions of the civil-service act approved January 16, 1883, and the amendments thereto and the rules established thereunder; and persons who have served as soldiers in any war in which the United States may have been engaged, who have been honorably discharged from the service of the United States, and the widows of such soldiers, shall have preference in the matter of employment; and all new appointments to the permanent clerical force in the Census Office hereby created shall be made in accordance with the requirements of the civil-service act above referred to.

This is what was put in in place of section 5—an entire new section, entirely opposite in meaning, and necessarily must be so in execution. Here is section 5 as passed by the House and Senate:

SEC. 5. That all the employees of the Twelfth Census Office, at the date of the passage of this act, above the grade of skilled laborer, shall be, and they are hereby, placed without further examination, under the provisions of the civil-service act approved January 16, 1883, and the amendments thereto and the rules established thereunder; and all new appointments to the clerical force in the Census Office hereby created shall be made in accordance with the requirements of the civil-service act above referred to.

What further does the statement show in connection with section 5? The statement as to section 5 is this:

Section 5 of the proposed bill provides for the appointment of the present employees of the Census Office by the Director of the Census, with the approval of the head of the Department to which said office is attached. The conferees examined a number of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and found that the chief officer of a bureau attached to an executive department is not the "head of a department" within the meaning of Article II, section 2, of the Constitution so as to authorize Congress to vest in him the power of appointment. (United States v. Germaine, 99 U. S., 508.) It is proper, however, to provide that the chiefs of bureaus shall make the appointments with the approval of the head of the executive department. (United States v. Hartwell 6 Wallace, 385.) It is believed that the section submitted by the conferees will effect the wishes of the members of the House.

How in the world could these conferees suppose that that section could effect the wishes of the members of the House? After a long discussion in both House and Senate they had voted to pass the employees of the Census Office as a body under the civil-service law. This section does not pass anybody under the civil-service law except such as are appointed thereafter. What else do the conferees say in their statement? They say:

In conclusion, the conferees on the part of the House desire to state that the bill finally agreed upon and now reported to the House is substantially the same as the one passed by the House January 30, 1902.

I want to know how this House, from that statement, after it being said that the bill was substantially the same as that passed by the House on a specific date, could be enlightened by this statement; how could it be anything else than grossly outraged and deceived? That statement does not inform, but it is misleading and deceives, and it was passed without the House knowing a word except what the chairman said, and I will read it in full. It is as follows:

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the statement presented by the conferees on the part of the House so fully covers all of the items of disagreement between the two bodies that I take it it will be unnecessary for me to make any further statement. The bill is practically the same as it passed the House.

This is the oral statement of the chairman, accompanied by the written statement that the bill is practically the same. Section 5 in the report is of no kin to section 5 in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SIMS. I will; yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman's position is that the committee deceived the House. That is what he is trying to show?

Mr. SIMS. The conference committee; not the Select Committee on the Census.

Mr. LOUD. It is the conference committee that we are talking about. That is the gentleman's complaint?

Mr. SIMS. That is my complaint,

Mr. LOUD. Now, the gentleman need not answer this unless he chooses, but I would like his opinion as to whether he thinks that deception was more honest in its results and better for the interest of the civil service of the country than if we had done what we were attempting to do. We were attempting to steal something and did not accomplish it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to that; I am glad the gentleman asked the question. My contention is that the House was deceived, and deceived by the action of the conference committee, in violation of the rules of the House and of all parliamentary rules. I contend that a conference committee has no right to strike out the text that has been agreed upon by the two Houses and substitute therefor a new text entire, and then state to this House that it is substantially like the act that passed the House on a specific day, when it is not substantially the same, but entirely different.

Mr. Chairman, bills when they are introduced into this House are printed. We have time to read and study them. The reports upon them from the committees are printed, and we have time to read and study them. But here comes in a conference report of the highest privilege, not printed, acted upon suddenly under the idea that a result might follow, which I will refer to in a moment, if the bill was passed speedily, brought in on a day on which great impatience is manifested—to wit, on the day that private pension bills are considered—if any other business is presented, and through an absolutely misleading statement disposed of in haste and without full consideration. I ask this House if the integrity of the House has not been assailed? If it has got so that conferees can not be believed, if the House has got to investigate every conference report in every detail and can not take the word of honorable gentlemen, to what pass have we come? The injury which has been inflicted upon this House reaches far above the few census clerks that might be affected by it. If such action has been done willfully, it calls for the strongest censure upon any member of this House so offending, if no stronger punishment is inflicted; but inasmuch as one of the distinguished gentlemen affected by the remark is not here I will not propose at this time any punishment.

Mr. WARNOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. WARNOCK. There has been so much confusion that I have not been able to hear distinctly what the gentleman says is the difference between the section as passed by the House and this report that was agreed upon by the conferees.

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad to state it more specifically. In substance, section 5 provided that those who should be in the Census Office at the passage of the act should be entitled to the privilege of the civil-service law without further examination, and thereby become subject to transfer. It was not the object of section 5 to demand that the Director of the Census should keep a number of useless clerks. The object was to make those clerks subject to transfer—to give them a place under the civil-service law, so that they might be transferred to any other department upon the demand of the head of such department as though they had gone through in the usual way.

Section 5 of the report of the conferees does not even deal with this question; but it designates who may appoint and how employees may be appointed, and provides that when so appointed they shall become subject to the civil-service law. While the report says that the section was stricken out, the statement does not show it. At the request of the chairman of the conference committee the report was not read, but the statement was.

Now to the point. I consider that the fact that certain census clerks were to be affected by the law as passed by the adoption of the conference report is a matter of utter insignificance as compared to the gravity of the action of the conferees, or whoever of them has done this thing. It goes to the integrity of the House.

Mr. Chairman, even if the bill as passed is better than the one this House supposed it was acting on, the question is, How was it passed? Have we any right to legislate in this way? I challenge the statement that the law as actually passed is better than the law as this House intended to pass it. Let us see. What does the civil-service examination do? It shows that the person who has stood the examination possesses certain qualifications. With these qualifications he may be appointed to a place in the public service. When he has successfully passed that examination and goes upon the eligible list, what has he got? Simply a slim opportunity to be appointed—no certainty; it is a mere chance to be appointed; and when he is appointed he is to be further trained by actual service in order that he may be fitted for the duties to be performed in the position to which he is appointed.

Now, we have 1,800 or 2,000 clerks who have passed an examination which, as shown by the discussion in the Senate and the House, is, as a test of the qualifications of the appointee, superior to the regular civil-service examination. In addition to that, these employees of the Census Bureau have had eighteen or twenty months' service—possibly two years. None of the permanent employees have served less than eighteen or twenty months. They have had this much actual experience in clerical work of a high, technical order.

Now, my friends, looking to the good of the country, looking to the good of the service, when the head of a Department wishes to call for a clerk why should he not consider the service which has been performed and take a clerk who has had all the benefits of a higher order of examination than the civil-service examination, as provided under the law, and in addition has had an experience of over one year of actual clerical work?

Therefore, I say, in answer to the gentleman from California, that in providing that these clerks should be placed under the benefits of the civil service, so that they might be called for by the heads of the different Departments, we acted in the interest of the whole country—in the interest of the public service. We were not moved alone by the claims of the clerks who without such legislation were liable to discharge. I will not deny that that consideration formed a part of the case as we acted upon it.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. If it is a fact that a member of this House at the head of a conference committee has brought in here a report which has actually misled and deceived the House, and thereby nullified a paragraph or some portion of the bill as we intended to pass it—if that is the fact, and the gentleman in speaking about it seems to think it is true—what redress have we? What course would the gentleman suggest—what plan of redress? In case the thing is true, what would he have us do in the premises?

Mr. SIMS. Inasmuch as the chairman of the conference committee is not present this morning, I do not wish to state what I think ought to be done if these matters are true, as they appear to be. I should prefer to have the gentleman make his statement before we determine what should be done, if anything. All the statements I have made are matters of record, and appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TALBERT. In other words, what can the House do? Can there be a committee appointed——

Mr. SIMS. The House can do anything, even expel, if it thinks the offense grave enough.

Mr. LOUD. Now, will the gentleman yield to a suggestion?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. I know the gentleman wants to be fair, and I do not believe in anybody "deceiving the House;" but in view of the fact that nobody had discovered the effect of the provisions contained in that conference report until the Attorney-General (it is so reported) gave a learned decision upon the meaning of the section, is it not possible that even the chairman of the committee may not have understood just how somebody else might construe that provision?

Mr. SIMS. I think it is very possible that such may have been the case. But the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] made a hypothetical statement, based upon a supposed statement of facts.

Mr. LOUD. If any gentleman has deceived the House, he ought to be and will be punished in his own conscience. But I have some doubt whether the gentleman referred to did intend any deception, in view of the fact that many members of Congress who looked at the provision as passed could not determine its meaning; and it may be possible that two of the best lawyers in the country in determining a legal question like this might give different interpretations. Is not that possible?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman a question. Has any member of this House examined the section as reported by the conferees and passed in connection with section 5, which was stricken out, that does not know that they do not mean the same thing?

Mr. LOUD. That I do not know; but it is currently reported, however, that the Attorney-General took some three or four days to determine what this provision did mean.

Mr. SIMS. If it is permissible, I will make a statement which I think will throw some light on that question. When this report was printed—and I saw it on Saturday, after it went into the RECORD on Friday—I read that section, and in connection with Mr. SNODGRASS, my colleague from Tennessee, on Saturday, the day after it was passed, went to the Census Office to see the Director, but he was not present. We then called on the chief clerk in the appointment division, Mr. Langley, and called his attention to this and wanted to know what it meant. The best we could get out of it from his statement was that this had application to the appointments to be hereafter made in a permanent Census Office; and he further said, as I understood him, though I might be mistaken, that to remove all doubt a list was then being made out, and just as soon as the act was passed that every clerk then in the Bureau would be reappointed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LOUD. Then he so understood that provision after it was passed——

Mr. SIMS. He understood, in order to get around the provisions of a law passed through this House that was never intended, that they could accomplish the purpose in that indirect way by having the whole force reappointed. That section did not deal with appointments as passed by the House and Senate.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to make one more suggestion, and then I will stop and allow the gentleman to have all the time he desires?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Outside of the bare proposition of deceiving the House, if we look at it from the ultimate results, I should say that the conference committee deserve the eternal thanks of Congress for what has been accomplished.

Mr. SIMS. That is a question on which I must take issue with the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. That is, we tried to steal something, but they prevented us from accomplishing it, metaphorically speaking.

Mr. SIMS. I must take issue with the language of the gentleman. This House, in the most open manner, after we had discussed the measure several hours in the House, and it was also discussed at length in the Senate, in which the intention of the House was stated to cover into the service men well qualified to be therein, men better qualified than could be had in the regular way, passed this bill. Does the gentleman call that stealing?

Mr. LOUD. Well, it is taking an office or two.

Mr. SIMS. How does it show stealing?

Mr. RUCKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Do I understand the gentleman from California says that the House attempted to steal something?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, metaphorically speaking.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects to the language, Mr. Chairman, and I want to know if the gentleman from Tennessee objects to the gentleman from California making a confession if he wants to make it.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from California does not need to make any confession.

Mr. RUCKER. That is a wholesale accusation against us all.

Mr. LOUD. You all voted for it.

Mr. RUCKER. I did not try to steal anything, however.

Mr. LOUD. I will say that I would never have voted for it if I had had the opportunity of voting.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that the House did the same identical thing with reference to temporary clerks in the War Department and in the Treasury Department, in the appropriation bill for the executive, judicial, and legislative departments.

Mr. SIMS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have not examined those bills, but I have no doubt that my distinguished friend from Georgia is entirely correct.

Mr. RUCKER. If one was a steal, then the other is a steal.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly, and the gentleman from California may take the same view. I want to defend the House from the charge of having stolen anything. Stealing is done secretly; it is not done openly. It is done more like this section was gotten through in this report.

Mr. SNOOK. I want to ask this question: If a casual reading of the section as contained in the original bill, and comparing it with the section as contained in the report of the conference committee, will not show that they are on totally different subjects?

Mr. SIMS. I want to answer the gentleman from Ohio and state that not only a casual reading but a careful reading shows that they are on totally different subjects.

Mr. SNOOK. One more question: Taking that in connection with the statement of the committee that there were some grave doubts about the constitutionality of section 5 as it was reported to the House by the conference committee, did not that tend to mislead the House directly as to what was in that section?

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly, Mr. Chairman, the report of the conferees, or the statement, speaks about a doubt as to the constitutionality of section 5, when section 5 does not say one word about who is to make the appointment, but——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that he have ten minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I will not use much time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman be granted ten minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The time of the gentleman is extended.

Mr. RUCKER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. I should like to know if it is any more of a steal for the House and the Senate, after full discussion, to pass this bill placing people in the classified service who have stood an examination and shown their qualifications than it is for the Chief Executive Officer of this Government to place all of the postal employees in the classified service without examination?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, if the President has acted within the law, he has acted within his right and duty, and I have no criticism of that; but, I want to say, this Congress made the civil-service law. Congress created every provision in it. Can not Congress repeal it absolutely, or modify or amend? And this expression of Congress, placing a certain body of ladies and gentlemen, whose qualifications were well known, under the provisions of that act is, it seems to me, as much within the power of Congress as was the passage of the original act itself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand the gentleman to be a lawyer, and a good one. Has the gentleman examined the constitutionality of section 5 as it was contained in the bill passed in the House?

Mr. SIMS. I have not, Mr. Chairman; neither can I conceive that there could be a constitutional question involved in it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Those clerks were appointed or employed in the Census Bureau by the Director of the Census alone, without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The Constitution vests the power of appointment in the President, the judges of the Supreme Court, and the heads of the departments; and I understand it was the judgment of the lawyers on the committee of conference that the original appointment of the clerks in the Census Office was of doubtful validity, and they thought, as a matter of prudence, it was necessary to have these clerks reappointed by or with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and that explains why this change was made in conference.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had that suggestion made to me before, but not, however, any more forcibly or clearly than the gentleman from Indiana has made it.

If the question had come up that every appointee in that office was not in fact an appointee, because his appointment had been made in violation of the Constitution, why, then, there would be some reason for adding a section or offering an amendment which would legalize their appointment; but section 5 in the bill has no reference to the manner of the appointment. It simply designates a certain class of persons, called clerks, in the Census Office to be placed under the civil-service law; and I ask the gentleman from Indiana if this Congress has not the power to place certain persons, either by name or as a class, under the provisions of the civil-service law who never were clerks and never took an examination?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It might have the power, but it was not the purpose of the House. The House passed the bill with the understanding that these clerks had been legally appointed. There is no question about that; and the conferees, on a careful and critical examination of the question, thought it was one of doubtful constitutionality, and to save any question that provision was included in the conference report, with the understanding, of course, that the clerks were all to be reappointed.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand the gentleman from Indiana, the conferees were intending to provide for a legal appointment, in view of certain constitutional troubles which had been discovered by themselves?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And they also provided that when so appointed they should be subject to the civil-service law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Therefore it left it entirely discretionary with the Director of the Census or the Secretary of the Interior as to who should become subject to the civil-service law, whereas this House had said that all of them should be subject to it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The theory of the conferees, on an investigation of the matter, was that it was necessary to reappoint all of these clerks in order that their pay might be legal and the accounts of the Director of the Census might be properly audited. They thought some question might arise as to the validity of his expenditure of the appropriation, and it was to cover that question that the conferees, I am informed, made the report.

Now, I was not one of the conferees. I knew nothing about the change in section 5 until I saw the bill after the conference report had been concurred in by both Houses, and I confess I was as much surprised as the gentleman or anybody else, but I can not believe that the conferees attempted to deceive the House in making that report.

Mr. SIMS. I have not made that statement. I do not make it. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana, who is a fair man, an able lawyer, and a worthy member of this House, if it was not the solemn duty of these conferees in making their statement, both written and orally, to make it so clear and explicit that no one could fail to understand it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was; and the statement made by the conferees and read in the House contains the substance of section 5 as it was agreed upon. It was read by the Clerk of the House, and it was known that the report was going to be made that day, and no question was asked in regard to it. The RECORD shows that it was read.

Mr. SIMS. And why? Because the chairman said that the bill was substantially as it passed this House. Does the gentleman contend that it is substantially as it passed this House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The chairman believed it to be.

Mr. SIMS. I am asking the gentleman the fact about it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. An interpretation was afterwards placed upon it which was not contemplated or expected by any member of the conference committee from either House. That originated in another quarter. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNOOK. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana this question: Do I understand the gentleman to say that his idea was that the conferees thought that all of these employees in the Census Office would be reappointed immediately upon the passage of this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That was the earnest and sincere belief of the conferees, and was the purpose and intention of the Director; and I know personally he had a list made up of every employee of the office ready to be sent at once to the Secretary's office for approval as soon as the bill was signed by the President.

Mr. SNOOK. I call the gentleman's attention to the language of the section, in which it says they "may" be appointed by the Director. Does the gentleman think that the idea of the conferees was that that would make it the duty of the Director to appoint?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That form is frequently employed even in mandatory provisions. It is usual to use the term "may," and where it is used it is often construed to be mandatory, and it was doubtless intended to be as to this provision.

Mr. SIMS. Now I yield to my colleague to ask a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Indiana stated that the conference report was read. Does the RECORD show it was read?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The statement was read.

Mr. SIMS. The RECORD shows that the report was not read, upon the request of the chairman that the statement be read.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The statement was read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the statement was made that the bill was substantially as reported to the House and as it passed from the House. Is that correct?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman just now asked my colleague what is the duty of a chairman in reporting a bill to the House.

Mr. SIMS. This is a conference report.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A report of a committee of conference is just the same. Such committee has a chairman—a mouthpiece. That question was raised and answered in the United States Senate by the late Senator Sherman, and he said it was the duty—and the Senate agreed—of the chairman and as chairman in reporting a bill to explain the bill—what it meant section by section—and he was right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is no question of that kind about this.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That was not done in this case.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The rules of the House require that the conferees shall submit a written statement, showing what changes have been made in the bill. That statement was submitted, was read in full, and showed exactly what changes had been made in this section 5. The RECORD shows that.

Mr. SIMS. Now let me reply to that, while it is fresh. The report shows that section 5 had been stricken out, which was the fact, and had the statement shown that, we could blame ourselves for sleeping while it was read; but the statement does not show that section 5 was stricken out. The statement shows that the bill is substantially as it passed the House.

Mr. TALBERT. In view of all this uncertainty, ambiguity, and difference of opinion, does not the gentleman think that the best way out of the hole is to have a committee appointed to investigate the whole matter, so that all parties concerned can have a hearing, and make a report to this House, so that some proceedings might be taken?

Mr. SIMS. I can not make that motion now. I propose only to discuss the facts and try to have the House understand them, as well as to get a little information.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference in effect upon the future transfer of these clerks of the Census Office to other departments between the bill as it has become law and the bill as it passed this House?

Mr. SIMS. Why, the difference is this: If the bill had become law as it passed the House and went to the Senate and passed the Senate, and had become law without the changes made in the conference report, every employee of the Census Office on the signing or approval of the bill would be in office or in the classified service subject to transfer.

Mr. MANN. Subject to transfer by the head of the executive department of the Government.

Mr. SIMS. At the request of the heads of the departments.

Mr. MANN. But not subject to transfer to the extent to make them all transferred?

Mr. SIMS. Subject to transfer; but by virtue of this if the head of the department can not call for one of them they are out.

Mr. MANN. In the one case the President must consent to the transfers being made first, and in the other case he must consent to their being reappointed first. The power is left under the control of the President in either case.

Mr. SIMS. That is your statement.

Mr. MANN. Is not that the fact?

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to discuss another matter before it gets out of my mind.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has stated, and has given reasons for it, that the whole force in the Census Office below the Director himself was illegally appointed, and that in order for them to be legally appointed they must be reappointed; and in order to be reappointed was the excuse for striking out the section and putting in a new one. That bill has been the law since the 6th of March and this is the 12th. Have you heard of a single employee in the Census Office being reappointed?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, just a word in answer to that question. Immediately on the passage, or soon after the passage, of the act of March 3, 1899, the question of the validity of the appointment of the Director of the Census alone was submitted to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General decided that appointments made by the Director alone were valid, inasmuch as the control of the Secretary of the Interior over that Bureau was purely nominal and technical; and he gave quite an extensive opinion on the subject, and it is published in his published official opinions, but the Attorney-General did not discuss the constitutional question.

That was raised, I understand, by the conferees on the part of the Senate. It was regarded as a serious question, and it was thought necessary to reappoint; but now you have the views of two tribunals, of two functionaries. The Attorney-General has said that the appointments by the Director of the Census are valid, and the conferees of the Senate and House have stated that there is a question about their validity; and in the statement which was read they cite two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that appointment of officers by anyone but the heads of departments is invalid. Now, the Director of the Census is going on under the opinion of the Attorney-General rendered something like three years ago. There have been no reappointments, and the present order states that there shall be none until the 1st day of July of this year.

Mr. SIMS. The whole question at issue is that we can not by law pass these clerks under the provisions of the civil-service law because they have not been appointed as the conference committee think they ought to be appointed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the power of Congress to do that was not up, but it was one of propriety. Doubtless it occurred to the minds of the conferees as a peculiar exercise of the legislative power, to take a body of men who were not in the employment of the Government, who had not passed the civil-service examination, and say that they should be eligible to transfer. They have the power to do it, I concede, but it would be an unusual exercise of legislative power to incorporate any such force that was not legally in the service of the Government and had not passed the civil-service examination.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman want to surrender the judgment of the House to a conference committee to make changes and then make no reference to them in their report?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The conferees reported to the House, and they complied with the rules and custom of the House in supplying information. They brought in a report and a written statement. The report was not read by unanimous consent, but the statement was read, and there was a full compliance with the rules of the House.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman another question, because he always answers candidly: Could you, or did you, from the reading of the written statement, think for one moment that section 5 of the House and Senate bill had been stricken out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I confess I did not.

Mr. SIMS. Then, how could the gentleman have been informed by the statement of the conferees, and was not the House justified for any dereliction or lack of duty?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must bear in mind that the statement complies with the rules and custom of the House, and if there is any fault at all it was the fault of the usage and custom of the House in transacting its business.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman contend that this conference report is substantially what the House passed? Why, he knows he does not for a moment. The statement that it did substantially contain it was a misstatement. I want to say for one of the conferees, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. GRIFFITH, whom I know very well, and who is a friend of mine and I am a friend of his, that I believe him incapable of doing anything wrong.

Mr. KLUTTZ. And I want to say the same thing for the gentleman from Illinois, one of the conferees, Mr. HOPKINS, and also for the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. SIMS. I am not so well acquainted with them as I am with the gentleman from Indiana, but I hope some explanation can be given that will be satisfactory to the House, and I do hope that the discussion here upon this bill will forever prevent this kind of a conference report being again made to the House. We know the whole country was stirred from center to circumference about the demonetization of silver in 1873 by means of a conference report. It was hoped that that report would never have a successor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman think this came in in gum shoes and walked through like a cat? [Laughter.] Let me ask the gentleman whether he has read the statement in relation to section 5.

Mr. SIMS. I read it right here in the course of my remarks.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That statement seems to be a quite full explanation of the change that was made in section 5 as it passed the House.

Mr. SIMS. Well, that has all been gone over, and I do not think it worth while to go over it again.

Now, I want to conclude these remarks, which have probably not been very entertaining; and there may be others who want to say something. I am the last man in this House who would seek to cast any insinuation upon any member. I presume that all members are as good as I am, and many may be better, but I do think it is the duty of somebody to call the attention of the House to what I consider was a flagrant violation of the rules, which has led to a misunderstanding and the passage of a bill in a form in which I do not believe this House, if it understood the effect of its action, would have passed.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Presuming the gentleman, as a lawyer, has examined this case, I wish to ask him whether in his opinion it would not have been entirely possible for the President of the United States to have effectuated the known and expressed desire of the House under the amendment as made by the conference committee, as well as under the original section?

Mr. SIMS. I am not talking for the President. I am not his keeper by a great deal. But if the Director of the Census had reappointed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, every clerk in the Bureau, they would have come under the provisions of the act as passed, because they would have been appointed after the passage of the act, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. But the President saw proper in signing the bill to write a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, which I hold in my hand and will now read.

Mr. KLUTTZ. One more question: Does the gentleman think that the conferees could have foreseen this unexpected action of the President?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the conferees had nothing to do with that. They had to deal alone with the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate; and what we wanted to know was what action had been taken, in order that we might act intelligently; and that we did not find out from the conference committee.

Mr. GRIFFITH. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to ask a question, prefacing it with this statement: In view of three decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, section 5, as it passed the House, would have been totally inoperative, and by the same decisions, section 5, as passed by the Senate, would also have been inoperative. In view of that fact, what was the duty of the conferees? Was it not their duty to perfect that section so as to reflect just what was the legislative will—the intent of both the House and the Senate; and is it not the construction that has been placed upon the section, not by the Supreme Court, but by the President of the United States, that has brought about this discussion? If such a construction had not been placed upon this measure by the President, and the question had afterwards been raised in the courts, would not the conferees have been considered at fault for not having perfected the measure?

I take it that it was the duty of the conferees to frame the section in such a way as to carry out the will of both legislative bodies. The conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate were equally anxious to provide for the clerks in that bureau; and they thought they were doing so by the action that they proposed.

While on the floor let me take occasion to say that it was far from my intention, as I believe it was far from everybody else's intention, to purposely deceive or mislead the House. If the bill, including section 5 as originally passed by the House or Senate, the President would have signed the measure, but he and the Secretary of the Interior would have disregarded section 5, and the employees would have been in much worse condition than at present. The trouble arises from a construction given to the law by the President, which is clearly in violation of the legislative intention, as was well known by the President.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the very long question of the gentleman—and I am not complaining of its length, for I was glad to yield to him all the time he wanted—there is no man in the House for whom I have a higher regard—let me say, in the first place, I can not see how the decision of the Supreme Court which the gentleman has referred to can have any effect whatever on section 5. That section provided for the transfer into the civil service—it proposed to place under the protection of the law—certain persons designated. That provision had nothing in the world to do with the question who was to appoint them, and when they were to be appointed. And another part of the section says the same law shall apply to new appointments and has nothing to do with who makes the appointments, while the decision of the Supreme Court referred to deals with the question as to who of the officers makes the appointment, and has nothing whatever to do with the application of the civil-service law, which was the object and purpose of Congress.

Now, to the other question, have we as legislators or did that committee have the right or contemplate that they would make a law which, by the circuitous outside aid of other officers, would carry out the will of Congress, or did we have the right to carry out our own will in our own way by our own provision?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you think the House was deceived?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I notice the language of the gentlemen. I will not use the word "deceive" in the sense of willfulness, but I say the House was misled and deceived in voting for something they did not know they were voting for, and the statement of the conference committee ought to have shown it, so that there would be no mistake about it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] says he personally knows, and therefore puts it beyond doubt or cavil, that the Director of the Census was making up a list of all these employees, that they were going to be appointed with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and that the word "may" was a mandate.

I am surprised to hear the gentleman say that the word "may" when it is used merely in a permissible sense is a mandate. That section says that the employees of the Census Office of the present force may be appointed upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and that when so appointed they then become subject to civil service.

Now, then, to the other question or criticism indirectly made by some gentlemen. The Director of the Census, in order to please Congressmen—and I did not know that they had exacted any promise from him or that he has made us any—makes up a list of those to be appointed, and the Attorney-General of the United States construed the law; and certainly no member of this House will for a moment controvert that that was a correct construction. The section is absolutely clear so far as the appointees not being covered by civil-service law by the passage of the act. The President writes this letter addressed to the Secretary of Interior, which I will now read:

WHITE HOUSE, Washington, March 6, 1902.

SIR: I have signed the act providing for a permanent Census Bureau. Section 2 of this act provides that the work pertaining to the Twelfth Census shall be carried on by the Census Office under the existing organization until the 1st day of July, when the permanent Census Office herein provided for shall be organized by the Director of the Census. Section 5 provides that with your approval the Director of the Census may appoint into the permanent census force in two ways.

You see—the President took the plain view and the only view you can take of it, that section 5 had reference to the appointment into the permanent census force, and provides how that may be done, in the first place, from the present employees of the Census Office; and the Attorney-General and the President certainly very correctly construed the act, that it had no reference whatever to covering the present employees into the civil service. I will continue with the letter:

In the first place, from the present employees of the Census Office, and in the second place, all new appointments to be made in accordance with the civil-service law. After any of the present employees of the Census Office have been appointed upon the permanent force they become part of the classified service.

I have been over these two sections with the Attorney-General, and their construction seems to be perfectly clear. You will please inform the Director of the Census that his office will continue to be administered as it has been administered until the 1st of July. On that day he will, with your permission, appoint such members of the present force under him as will constitute the permanent census force, appointing only so many as are to be permanently employed. After that date all appointments will be made under the regulations of the civil-service act.

Very truly, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the construction of the President and the Attorney-General of the intention of Congress was given on the face of the act; and I want to see the member in this House that will controvert for a moment that they gave it the correct construction. I would like to know if Congress can not, upon the face of its own act, make known to the President what it intended to do; or shall he go on the outside? Shall he be compelled, by an indirect method, to determine what Congress wanted to do? The criticism of the President in this case, if it should be called one, goes to the effect that he did not come to the help of this body, who did not know how to do what they wanted to do by direction, and enable us to accomplish its purpose by indirection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman will readily admit that, under the bill as it became a law, the President had the power to have all of these clerks covered into the classified service by reappointment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that the President was called upon to make reappointments.

Mr. MANN. No; the President was not called upon, but the Director of the Census practically was, and it was by direction of the President that he was instructed not to do it, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, he is not instructed not to appoint. He is instructed to appoint, from the present force, the permanent employees only.

Mr. MANN. But he is instructed not to reappoint and cover into the classified service any clerks before the 1st of July or any clerks that are not needed in the permanent Census.

Mr. SIMS. He does not use the word "not," but he says after that appointments shall be made according to the civil-service act.

Mr. MANN. Is it the gentleman's construction of that letter that the Director of the Census or the Secretary of the Interior will still make appointments?

Mr. SIMS. I have no information; but my opinion is that the President was appealed to to save Congress in this dilemma, and he would not do it.

Mr. MANN. Would it not have had the same effect—I should like to have the gentleman's opinion, because he has studied this question—if the law had remained as it passed the House and the President had then written a letter, addressed to the various Secretaries under him, suggesting to them that they ask for no transfers from the classified service in the Census Bureau? Would they have complied?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, I will not dare to presume that the President of the United States would be guilty of so high-handed, so imperialistic, so czar-like an act as that.

Mr. MANN. The President has the appointing power. There is no czar-like act about it at all. He is the one who is responsible for appointments, and as I warned the House when the census bill was being considered here, in view of his attitude upon civil-service reform, he would not permit these clerks to be covered into the classified service for the purpose of having them transferred; and if the bill had passed Congress as it passed the House, I have no doubt that the President would have suggested to the Secretaries under him that these clerks be not transferred.

Mr. SIMS. He would not have had the letter of the law behind him in that case, and I do not believe that the President would deal with a matter of that kind so indirectly; and if we had passed the law as we intended to pass it, and the President had objected to it, I think he has the boldness to have vetoed it, instead of signing it and then directing his Cabinet officers not to call for transfers. I do not believe he would have signed and approved an act and then nullified it by orders to his subordinates. That is a thing of which I can not believe he would be guilty.

Mr. MANN. Transfers are like kissing; they go by favor. There is no legal right for a transfer from one place to another. Transfers must be called for before they can be made.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman says, could not the President have instructed the heads of departments not to have called for transfers?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and is not that practically what he has done now?

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman say he has any idea that the President would have done such a thing?

Mr. MANN. I never had the slighest doubt about it. I so stated before the House when the bill was under consideration here.

Mr. SIMS. I do not believe that the President of the United States will ever undertake in an indirect manner to nullify a law of Congress.

Mr. MANN. No; but when Congress undertakes in an indirect manner to force the President to permit transfers which he does not wish to make he has the power to decline, and he would have declined.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman call this section 5 in the bill an indirect method?

Mr. MANN. An indirect method of making appointments, certainly. It covers people into the classified service for what? Not to keep them in the service in the departments in which they were; not for the purpose of keeping them in the Census Bureau; not for the purpose of keeping them at the work that they were then doing, but for the purpose of permitting them to be transferred to the Post-Office Department, to the War Department, to the Navy Department, to country post-offices or city post-offices, in an indirect method of appointment which Congress had no power to make.

Mr. SIMS. That is a question of judgment. I do not call it an indirect method, but most direct and specific.

Mr. MANN. You admit he could do it.

Mr. SIMS. And do it openly, and not go behind the bush to do it.

Mr. MANN. It is the Executive who makes the transfer, and not Congress, and yet Congress had the power to do it directly; but Congress can not compel the President to do it; and in this case I think he is determined, and he has the power, to stand by the civil service and refuse to make the transfer.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say this once for all as to that matter. I do not believe the President would have done anything of the kind. If we had passed the bill as it had passed the House and Senate before it was sent to conference, if he did not like the bill he would have vetoed it. There is no question as to the power to do what he has done, and no question even as to the propriety.

Mr. MANN. The suggestion that I want to get to the mind of my friend from Tennessee is this: I have no doubt that the conferees in making the report in this case knew that in either case the power lay with the President—that in one case he could clothe it in this kind of a letter, and in the other case he could clothe it in another sort of a letter just as easily written as this was, and that it left the matter so that the President could or could not, as he pleased, make the transfers.

Mr. SIMS. I am not discussing the possibilities. I am talking about what was done in this House. All who are acquainted with the facts know that if the House had known the change in section 5 had been made so as to strike it out that the bill could not have been passed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois probably thought there was something else in the Census Bureau besides a few clerks to be transferred.

Mr. SIMS. I have not the least question as to that. That is not the question. The question for this House is that of the method by which the section was changed in the conference report, and which was accepted without time to examine it, without any previous print of it, that we ought to have had the very fullest information possible, and that the conference committee should have fully stated the changes to the House, and any failure to discharge that duty fully is a matter of the gravest consequence and importance in legislation.

I thank the committee for its long indulgence. I have nothing further to say. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a word ought to be said at this time in behalf of the conference committee. I do not think it is fair that gentlemen should give way to excitement about this matter. Members can not afford to exculpate themselves from the effects of inexcusable oversight or neglect by attacking the committee of conference. The whole question involved here is a simple one, to wit, Are the employees of the Census Office, above the grade of laborer, "officers" within the meaning of the Constitution? We all ought to have known that before now.

I take it that almost every man upon the floor, certainly every lawyer upon the floor, who had occasion to look into the validity of various appointments when the Spanish-American war broke out, knew that if these employees were "officers" there was not one of them who had been legally appointed if he had not been appointed by the head of a Department. Every one of us ought to have known that; ought to have known that the constitutional question, and the whole question involved, was, Are these employees "officers?" Well, it has been held by the Senate committee and conference committee that they are.

Mr. Chairman, I remember distinctly that when the chairman of the conference committee brought in the report and it was read it clearly stated that section 5 had been changed to bring it within the decisions of the Supreme Court holding that these appointments must be made by the head of a department. The gentleman who says that he wanted a fuller statement than that says that he wanted kindergarten information. If that change was made to bring it within this decision, it was on the ground that these employees were "officers," and as "officers" they must be appointed by the head of a department. It followed that every one of them in order to be legally employed must be reappointed.

If this House has been buncoed, it buncoed itself when it sent this bill to the Senate with section 5 in it. If you had made it to apply to the persons at work in the Census at a particular day, you would have got in the bill what you intended. If you had provided that the persons who had performed certain duties in the Census Office a given length of time, or in a score of other forms of phraseology, you would have expressed your meaning; but the section went out of here limited to the employees of the Census Office, and if they were not legal employees of the Census Office they were not really employees, and your section accomplished nothing.

Now, in the report of the conferees they say that the change was made to bring these appointments within the Constitution, as interpreted by the courts. You knew, then, and everybody else knew, that they all had to be reappointed, and we were not deceived about that. Why, the clerks in the Census Office understood it. Clerks that never studied law understood it. That section was copied from the Evening Star of the day it passed the Senate and brought up here to members, and the clerks not learned in the law pointed out that they would all have to be reappointed to come under the bill. If we were deceived about it, it was either because we were negligent, willfully blind, or had less intelligence than the girls in the Census Office on a matter of interpretation. The difficulty arose when? When the President issued an order to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen ought not to complain here and anathematize the committee of conference about that. The House passed a bad section under the Constitution without paying attention enough to the section to raise the question. If any committee is culpable, it is not for what was done in conference and the report, but in reporting the original section in that form. That is what you should criticise them for if you criticise them at all. But finding themselves in the conference in a dilemma, as the Senate committee believed and they came to believe; finding that there was not a single legal appointee in the Census Office and that that section applied to a blank, the question was, if possible, to cover the matter in a legal way without exploiting it.

The conference report is full enough and it did cover it, and the conference committee, in my judgment, were honest enough about it, and informed the House fully enough if we were carrying our intelligence around with us. Now, we suddenly arise to criticise the committee because the President has issued an order to the Secretary of the Interior. Well, you have gained something by the committee of conference's correction of the bill of the House, whoever is primarily responsible for that blundering, bungling section. You will get the permanent force of the Census Office after the 1st of July taken from your census clerks. Under your section you would have been entitled to nothing. That much you owe to the conference committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, in justification of the committee of conference, I simply want to repeat that when they stated to this House that it had been concluded that these clerks must be appointed by the head of a department, that was full notice to every one of us that there was not a clerk down there legally appointed. That carried with it the information that every one of them must be reappointed, and they provided that the Director of the Census might reappoint them, knowing, I might add, that he had the disposition to do so.

The committee of conference is not responsible for the Executive order. That is a matter unforeseen alike by them and by you. But do not any longer blame the committee of conference. Blame the Census Committee, if you will, for bringing in that ineffectual section; criticise the authority that issued the order, if you will; criticise this House for passing that section without observing that it accomplished nothing whatever, but do not criticise any more the committee of conference, who give you everything you got under this bill, when under your own you would have got nothing.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. In view of your judgment of the law, these gentlemen down there, employees, are in there without authority, as they have not been reappointed.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I say the whole question is involved in the other question, whether they are officers or not. That is the question for you to discuss.

Mr. SIMS. But, in your judgment, that is the fact?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes. If you want to criticise, raise the point that they are not officers and not within the Constitution, and then you have something to discuss. My judgment is, however, that they do come within the constitutional provision for "minor offices." But that is a matter of judgment. If you have got any grounds on which to attack anybody, it is upon the question whether they are officers or not. If they are not, this fifth section was unnecessary, the whole proceeding was unnecessary and misleading. If they are, the original section in the bill is bad. I have nothing more to say, Mr. Chairman, except that hereafter gentlemen should criticise those who have merited their criticism, whether the Census Committee or themselves, and not the committee of conference.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in my own right, as a member of the committee, for one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

Mr. COWHERD. I now desire to yield to my colleague, Mr DOUGHERTY, for twenty minutes.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the favor which is conferred upon me by my colleague, and I shall not abuse this opportunity by consuming any great length of time; perhaps not so much as has been allowed me, knowing, as I do, that there are others who desire to be heard on this occasion.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to address myself quite briefly to a portion of the bill that is under consideration, that part of it which relates to the rural free-delivery service.

I would feel that I had been derelict of my duty to that honorable constituency whom I am commissioned to represent on this floor if I failed to employ every opportunity that comes to me and what little influence I may exert to promote the cause of rural free delivery.

I take no mean degree of pride in the fact that for the major part I represent here a rural constituency, and right well may I be proud of the honor of representing such a district, where the wealth is not aggregated in the hands of a few, but is comparatively well distributed; where, in proportion to population, as many citizens own their own homes and till their own soil, and where the general intelligence has attained as high an average as in any other district in the Union.

There the fertility of the soil is not surpassed by any other on the habitable globe; there the orchard and the vine yield prodigiously, and the clover that carpets the earth vies with the sweet-scented meadows to burden the summer air with delightful perfume. Its vast fields of waving corn reflect back the sunshine, while the wheat locks it in its bearded sheaf. Upon its hills great herds of live stock grow fat in pastures of succulent blue grass, from which specimens are annually selected which prove prize winners in open competition with the world. And the fame of the Missouri horse and mule is not circumscribed by the boundaries of this continent, for they have done cavalry and artillery service in Europe, Asia, and Africa.

The incident is doubtless fresh in the memory of all of certain mules which, upon a time, drew the artillery of the British forces in South Africa, and, breaking away from the British and dragging the cannon with them, ran precipitately into the Boer ranks. Those were Missouri mules.

The poet doubtless had Missouri in contemplation when he described—

> A later Eden, planted in the wilds,
> With not an inch of earth within its bounds
> But if a slave's foot press it makes him free.
> Here, it is written, toil shall have its wage,
> And honor honor, and the humblest man
> Stand level with the highest in the law.
> Of such a land have men in dungeons dreamed,
> And, with the vision brightening in their eyes,
> Gone smiling to the faggot and the sword.

With such environments, so conducive to good citizenship and love of country, it follows logically that this great Commonwealth in the matter of high ideals, lofty patriotism, and devotion to the Federal Constitution should by precept and example teach the older States the lessons of their better days. And, sir, from such associations even the Missouri mule imbibes that spirit of courage and love of freedom and independence which moves even him, upon occasion, to swiftly fly to the side of any people, wherever found on this earth, who seek to light the torch of liberty at the fires that glow upon the altars of our American free institutions. [Applause.]

I therefore could not be otherwise than proud of the district which I have the honor to represent, and advocate with enthusiasm this measure, which contributes so materially to their welfare and comfort. And I will very cheerfully vote for a sufficient appropriation to organize, establish, and maintain the most efficient rural-delivery service.

I may also say at this time that I feel, in common with all others here, great interest and corresponding pride in the general excellence and efficiency of the Post-Office Department. It is with this Department that the people, perhaps, come in more frequent and direct contact than any other branch of the public service, and in the nature of the case it should be in fact, as it is held to be in theory, altogether nonpartisan in its management.

It was therefore with great regret that I witnessed the recent defeat, by the Republican majority of this House, of the following proposed amendment to the bill then pending:

> Any carrier in the free-delivery service who shall use his official position to promote the interest of any political party or candidate for office shall, upon proof of such fact, be dismissed from the service.

The spirit of that proposed amendment should be the law governing all the employees in the Post-Office Department and in every division thereof, and in the interest of good service it should be strictly enforced.

But it is the rural free-delivery service to which I desire more specifically to address my remarks.

In his last annual message to Congress President McKinley characterized the rural free-delivery service as the "most striking new development in the continued and rapid growth of the postal service." In this department of the postal service there has been no backward movement, but its extension has kept pace with the energy put forth and the appropriations made by Congress for its introduction and maintenance.

According to the last annual report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, the origin and progressive development of the service may be epitomized as follows:

Fiscal year.	Appropriation.	Services in operation.	Fiscal year.	Appropriation.	Services in operation.
1894	$10,000	(a)	1898	$50,000	148
1895	10,000	(a)	1899	150,000	391
1896	10,000	(a)	1900	450,000	1,276
1897	40,000	44	1901	1,750,000	4,301

[a] Not used.

The last Congress appropriated $3,500,000 for the maintenance and extension of rural free delivery for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and it is estimated that by the end of that time there will be in successful operation more than 8,600 routes.

It is further reported that every State in the Union, except Montana, a mountainous State with few rural settlements, is represented in this aggregation of services, and every Territory, except New Mexico, where two applications for rural free delivery are under investigation, and Hawaii, which is too new an acquisition to be considered in this connection. Even in our most northern territory of Alaska, within a short distance of the Arctic circle, an exceptional rural service was operated during the past summer between Nome and Gold River for the accommodation of thousands of miners congregated in that vicinity.

With the appropriation of $7,529,400 for rural delivery which this bill carries for the ensuing fiscal year, there should be thousands of new routes established and put in operation, and at the same time, to a large extent, the service should be revised and better systematized.

This is not the time or place to begin the enforcement of too strict economy. The great desideratum should be a sufficient appropriation, and no more and no less. We should be liberal, but not extravagant; economical, but not parsimonious.

While I am disposed to think that the city carriers are not overpaid, I am convinced that the rural carriers are yet underpaid. It must be remembered that the rural carrier is a sort of traveling postmaster. He is required to carry and sell stamps, receipt for money for money orders, registered letters, and do many other things which, perhaps, the other carriers are not required to do. The distances he has to travel varies from 15 to 30 miles and over the dirt roads of the country and not on paved streets. He must furnish his own team and conveyance and feed and keep the same in repair at his own expense.

Great circumspection should be exercised in the matter of selecting suitable able-bodied persons to do the service promptly and with dispatch, in all kinds of weather, if the service is to be acceptable and efficient. And when you deduct the necessary expenses from the gross salary of $50 per month, there is but a pittance left the rural carrier for his net salary.

The farmers of this whole country are entitled to have the best free-delivery service attainable. They are entitled to have delivered at their doors every day the market reports and the daily press; they are entitled to have, on the easiest terms, that literature placed in the hands of their sons and daughters which is calculated to make them intellectual, moral, and patriotic men and women.

Do they deserve it? Sir, I but speak the simple truth when I say that it is this class of our citizens upon whom the burden of taxation for governmental expenses falls most heavily and inequitably. And yet they are most prominent among those who make the nation's wealth in time of peace and defend the honor of the flag in time of war.

Whether my term of service here be long or short, yet if I may be privileged by my vote and voice to bear some humble part in the matter of promoting, systematizing, and rendering efficient this rural-delivery service, then with conscious pride I may say, in the language of Othello, "I have done the State some service, and they know it." [Loud applause.]

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] that portion of his time which I have not consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] desire now to occupy further time, or does he reserve his time?

Mr. COWHERD. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] desires to proceed now. I will resume the floor after he has concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, last week the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] assumed to question my zeal and conduct by discussing the pending measure with reference to the construction of a Pacific cable before the report of the committee was printed. He seems to forget two important facts. First, that the subject-matter has been under consideration by both branches of Congress for a number of years; secondly, that the majority report was ready, but was withheld for nearly a week at the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], who delayed its presentation to the House in order to incorporate the views of the minority, and to attach thereto the proposition of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company filed with the Attorney-General on the 8th day of February last, after the bill had been ordered reported to the House by the committee, and with the evident intention of meeting the effect thereof upon the members of this House.

The gentleman from Alabama does not seem to know that the same proposition was made last November to the President of the United States, with the hope of obtaining permission from the Executive to lay this cable across the Pacific. The gentleman does not seem to know that the President declined to assent to that proposition, because the Commercial Cable Company was unable to accept without qualification the express conditions that have been heretofore applied to all cables landing upon our shores.

He questions my zeal and seeks to find the motive which prompts such action. He should go back to the records of the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses and note the efforts made by private interests to secure this great public utility then opposing my measure, and study the scheming methods by which the Commercial Cable interests have been transformed from an active ally of a Government cable in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses into a partnership with an English corporation holding exclusive privileges and the monopoly of the cable rights in the Far East.

To illustrate his disinterestedness, he placidly tells us that in his long experience at the bar he has never represented corporations. I am glad he imparted this information, for the zeal and ability with which he championed the cause of the cable monopoly might have led us to think he had been schooled in the arts and ingenuity with which such corporations obtain control of public utilities.

I wonder what motive prompted the gentleman from Alabama to display such zeal as he manifested in his effort to defend this corporation, which, in defiance of the conditions heretofore imposed upon cable companies, seeks to usurp, without permission or authority, one of the most important privileges held by our country.

Why did not the gentleman from Alabama wait until the consideration of this measure had been properly brought before the House? What purpose has the gentleman in mind, or object to attain in rushing to the defense of this corporation?

From my long experience in the practice of the profession to which the gentleman belongs, I am led to believe that there is a motive back of every act in human life, whether in private or official capacity, and I would be glad if the gentleman would enlighten us upon the subject, and explain his own zeal and motive upon this measure.

If I were the only member of this House affected by his untimely assault upon the rights of the people, I might remain silent; but unfortunately the fair fame and noble record of the Democratic leader upon this floor has been unjustly maligned through the zealous defense of this grasping corporation by his namesake from Alabama.

I hold in my hand the leading Democratic paper of Michigan, in which in large headlines the Democratic leader upon this floor is placed in the humiliating attitude of defending a cable monopoly.

There may be little in a name, but when it confounds us with the interests of combines, trusts, and monopolies we may justly pray to be delivered from the blunders of our namesakes and the evils of such association.

But the gentleman from Alabama is not the only one who has volunteered to bolster up the acts of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company. I hold in my hands a circular letter, which has been mailed to the business men all over our country. It is signed by the United States Export Association, F. B. Thurber, president. This sinister old hypocrite appeared before our committee in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses in support of a Pacific cable with a Government subsidy, since which time he has changed his clientage. His great interest has prompted me to investigate the association he represents, and I find that the United States Export Association is a corporation under the laws of the State of New York, with a capital of only $500, barely enough money to pay for office furniture. Its president, Francis B. Thurber, is described as a lawyer; its directors are Thurber, lawyer; Charles H. A. Dougherty, broker, and Erastus N. Root, publisher. They may be justly described as a combination for the circulation of misinformation of a pettifogging shyster, curbstone jobber, and a printing press.

This is not the only trust for whom they have appeared and circulated letters with the hope of deceiving and misleading the business men of our country. Their circular letters are ingenious and misleading, but the influence of such disreputable methods will soon react upon the corporations using such villainous agencies. They may fool some people, but I am glad to note by communications I am constantly receiving that they are not fooling all the people.

The character of this man Thurber and his United States Export Association will become better known when we reach the consideration of the sugar trust and his disreputable conduct in connection with our Government in Cuba.

My friend from Alabama has another associate in the cause of the cable monopoly which I must not overlook—Mr. John Ford, who describes himself as the secretary of the American Asiatic Association of China. He came in company with and in the same saintly demeanor as his companion Thurber, and assumed to speak for a large foreign interest.

They may be just described as the "Devil's Duet" in the garb of the "Heavenly Twins," seeking to mislead the public and conceal the iniquity of the cable monopoly in its effort to steal the most valuable public franchise now held by our people.

The gentleman from Alabama admits that Great Britain is constructing a government cable down through the Pacific, in order to hold and control for her navy and people the benefit of cable communication with her possessions, but he is mistaken when he says that Great Britain offered the privilege of building this cable to a private company. Let me read for the information of the gentleman and members of the House the report of the committee presented to Parliament in 1899. In the summary of the report, under title of "Ownership," the committee states:

The committee are of opinion that the cable should be owned and worked by the governments interested—

Referring to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the other British colonies. Again the committee say:

If government assistance, in some form or other, is necessary, the committee think that a scheme under which the cable would be constructed and owned by the governments interested is much to be preferred to a private company working under a government subsidy.

Does that sound as though Great Britain was willing to give a subsidy for the construction of her cable in the Pacific?

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that Great Britain has purchased, owns, and controls over 20,000 miles of cable in addition to the one now being constructed in the Pacific, and it matters not whether she acquired it by direct government construction or obtained it as she did the Suez Canal, by buying stock of the corporations holding the cables when she desired them for the purpose of protecting her military power and expanding her trade and commerce. What difference can the gentleman find between the government construction and the government purchase, operation, and control of public utilities?

It is stated in the report and in my remarks upon this floor that the Eastern Extension Cable Company claims to hold the exclusive right to lay and operate cables connecting the island of Guam and the Philippines, and the absolute monopoly of cable communication with China.

Lest some one hereafter questions this statement, I submit a paragraph from the contract held by the Eastern Extension Company, giving them a monopoly of the cable privileges until 1940, as follows:

First. The concession of an extension for twenty years (which will expire May 8, 1940) of the monopoly enjoyed by the aforesaid company for the working of the Hongkong-Manila cable, until which date no other submarine telegraph line can be laid between the points mentioned.

Second. The extension of the landing privilege for a period of twenty years of the cables the concession for which may be granted for the purpose of joining all the Spanish possessions in the Pacific Ocean and of connecting them with other countries, such period to be reckoned from the date on which the new cable is opened for working.

I repeat that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, by the admissions of Mr. Ward, has become a partner for the purpose of extending the monopoly held by the Eastern Extension Cable Company in the Pacific Ocean.

The gentleman from Alabama does not seem to comprehend, or purposely misconstrues, the dangerous modifications in the proposal of the Commercial Cable Company with reference to laying cables upon our shores.

As long ago as 1875, President Grant forbid the landing of a French cable upon our shores because the company seeking to make the landing held exclusive privileges from France which would deny to American citizens and companies the right to land cables in France, and the conditions that have always been imposed upon cable companies landing cables upon our shores provide "that neither company nor any cable with which it connects shall hold exclusive privileges" which would prevent the establishment of an American cable upon such land.

Does the gentleman deny that such exclusive privileges are held covering the island of Guam and the Philippines, as well as China? Does he deny that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has made a contract which will give to it the right to land upon Guam and the Philippine Islands and deny to every other citizen or corporation of the United States like privileges?

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that before the Commercial Cable Company can land its cable upon our islands in the Pacific the exclusive privileges held by its partner must be abrogated and set aside.

I also charge that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has combined with the Eastern Company, with whose lines it connects, for the purpose of regulating rates, and that this contract is in direct violation of not only the conditions to which I have referred with reference to landing of cables, but also a violation of the act of 1890, known as "the antitrust law."

Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to stand before his people advocating a measure that will extend the influence and power of the greatest trust of modern times? Does he forget the declaration of the Democratic party in its national platform against trusts? Does he desire to be confronted in the next campaign with the charge that he upholds the hands of the cable monopoly?

Mr. Chairman, we have not quite finished with our investigations of the methods and the combining schemes of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company. Let me read the testimony of Mr. George G. Ward, vice-president of this company, wherein he admits a combination by his company with other cable lines for the control of the tariff rates across the Atlantic. This should command the attention of Congress:

Mr. CORLISS. The cables across the Atlantic Ocean have a uniform tariff rate, have they not?
Mr. WARD. Yes.
Mr. CORLISS. Those rates—they did not always exist, did they?
Mr. WARD. No, sir.
Mr. CORLISS. There was a time when the rate was only 12½ cents per word, was there not?
Mr. WARD. Yes; but that was a fighting rate, and existed only for two months.
Mr. CORLISS. And as a result of a mutual understanding they established a higher rate?
Mr. WARD. Yes, sir; in consequence of the great loss of the lower rate, the companies agreed to charge a reasonable rate of 25 cents per word.
Mr. CORLISS. Had the companies agreed among themselves that they would establish a rate?
Mr. WARD. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CORLISS. You admit that there is an understanding or agreement with reference to tolls crossing the Atlantic?
Mr. WARD. There is.

Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I remaining of my thirty minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. I want to conclude by calling attention to the testimony of Mr. Ward, given before the committee, in which he admitted that a combination had been formed by the Atlantic cable companies to regulate tolls, and in the few minutes that I have remaining I want the Clerk to read a joint resolution which I will offer and have referred in the proper way to the committee, and which I will bring before this House at a later date, for the purpose of determining whether or not a combination for the regulation of tolls can be made without some one taking action to suppress such a monopoly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is admitted by Mr. George G. Ward, an officer of the Commercial Cable Company, that said company has made a combination with other cable companies for the purpose of establishing a uniform rate for cable messages across the Atlantic Ocean in direct violation of paragraph 2 of the conditions imposed upon cable lines heretofore laid; and

Whereas said combination is a direct violation of section 2 of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies;" and

Whereas it has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that monopolizing telegraphic communication with a foreign country is within the description of the aforesaid act: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to institute such proceedings as may be deemed necessary to destroy such combination and monopoly and to punish the violation of said act.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears from the testimony of Mr. Ward that a combination exists in direct violation of the Sherman antitrust law. At the proper time I will present to this House the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States showing that this law applies to telegraph and cable communications. I call the attention of members at the present time to its violation, because this admission is boldly and brazenly made to the committee, and the same people to-day are defying our Government, claiming that they have a right to lay this cable without permission of the President or Congress.

I submit that it is time that some one should call public attention to these flagrant violations of law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield a moment for an interrogatory?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You state that there is a trust, prohibited by the Sherman antitrust law, which is controlling the cable service between this country and Manila, and other places?

Mr. CORLISS. The cable that I refer to is across the Atlantic.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it in a trust?

Mr. CORLISS. The testimony is that an agreement was made to control cable tolls across the Atlantic. The cable tolls at one time were 12½ cents a word. They are now 25 cents a word, in consequence of this agreement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the distinguished gentleman state whether or not he has called this trust or combine to the attention of the Attorney-General of the United States or of the President?

Mr. CORLISS. That is in the resolution which I have just had read, directing the Attorney-General to take proceedings against them, and if I can get a hearing I will have it adopted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not necessary that Congress should do that. It may be done by an individual. I ask the gentleman the question: Can not an individual call it to the attention of the Attorney-General, and has the gentleman done that?

Mr. CORLISS. The matter is being presented in an official way. I think that is the better manner of reaching public matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will succeed in reaching the Attorney-General and in making him do his duty.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COWHERD. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I had forty-five minutes remaining. I desire to yield such time as the gentleman may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the few remarks which I desire to submit are very appropriate in view of the able speech on Government ownership of the cable just made by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS]. As a basis for my remarks I desire the Clerk to read the joint resolution which I send to the desk, in order that it may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 79) providing for the purchase and operation of certain telegraph lines.

Resolved, etc., That in pursuance of section 93 of the postal laws, which is in words and figures as follows:

"SEC. 93. Companies to file acceptance.—Before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by law, such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster-General of the restrictions and obligations required by law." (Rev. Stat., pp. 52-68.)

And in pursuance of section 96 of the postal laws, which is in words and figures as follows:

"SEC. 96. Postmaster-General to select appraisers for the United States.—The United States may, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all companies acting under the provisions of the act of July 24, 1866, entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, or other purposes,' or under this title, at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster-General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected." (Rev. Stat., pp. 52-67.)

And in pursuance of section 97 of the postal laws, in words and figures as follows:

"SEC. 97. The following-named companies have filed acceptances pursuant to section 93 prior to December 5, 1892, and on the dates respectively stated: Western Union Telegraph Company, July 8, 1867; Postal Telegraph Company, August 31, 1882."

The United States of America purchase the Western Union Telegraph Line and the Postal Telegraph Line and operate and maintain the same in connection with the postal department, under such laws and rules as may be provided.

SEC. 2. That for the purchase and operation of said telegraph companies the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed, within thirty days from taking effect of this resolution, to appoint two disinterested persons for each of said telegraph companies to act as appraisers for the United States, and that immediately thereafter he shall notify said telegraph companies of such appointment and demand that each appoint two disinterested persons to act as appraisers and that the four thus selected appoint a fifth person to act as an appraiser, and that the five persons thus selected shall proceed to appraise all property belonging to the telegraph companies which is used in the operation of its lines at its actual value.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of each of said telegraph companies, within thirty days from such notification by the Postmaster-General, to appoint two disinterested persons as appraisers, and within ten days from the selection by the telegraph companies of said appraisers the four persons thus selected shall appoint a fifth person, and the appraisers thus selected shall, within one year from such selection, appraise all of the property of said telegraph companies which is necessary in the operation of their lines at its actual value, and within thirty days from said time report the result thereof to the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster-General shall submit the report of the appraisers to the first Congress which shall convene after said report is made, and if the report thus submitted shall be approved by Congress, then there shall be appropriated an amount sufficient, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay said appraisement; and upon such payment the Government shall be the owner of said telegraph companies, together with all of their instruments, poles, wires, rights, franchises, and easements which are necessary in and about their operation.

SEC. 5. That upon the consummation of said purchase Congress shall pass such laws as may be necessary in and about the operating of the telegraph companies in connection with the postal laws, and that the said telegraph companies thus purchased shall be known and named as the United States Telegraph.

SEC. 6. If either of said telegraph companies fail, neglect, or refuse to appoint the appraisers, after being notified by the Postmaster-General as aforesaid, then it shall be the duty of the appraisers appointed by the Postmaster-General to select a third person, and the three persons thus selected shall proceed to appraise said property in the manner aforesaid and make their report to the Postmaster-General, who shall submit said report to Congress as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 7. That each of said appraisers appointed by the Postmaster-General shall receive the sum of $15 per day for each and every day in actual service, and in addition thereto his necessary expenses in and about said appraisement; and he shall, under oath, render an itemized account of his expenses and the number of days in actual service. And the cost and expenses of the fifth person as an appraiser shall be divided equally between the Government and the telegraph company, and is not to exceed the sum of $15 per day and expenses.

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. This resolution, Mr. Chairman, was introduced by me in the usual and ordinary manner as provided by the rules of this House. It was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and there it met a most cruel fate.

It is a beautiful custom which has existed from the time when the mind of man runneth not to the contrary that the friends of the deceased should on some appropriate occasion speak feelingly and fittingly in his memory. In conformity with this ancient custom, and in response to my own feelings and convictions, I desire to say a few words as to the life of this resolution, its hopes, its aspirations, and its untimely fate. [Laughter.] I regret that its life is seemingly of short duration, and that it is to be cut down in the heyday of its existence. It possibly did not live long enough to exert any influence per se. It was not all it should have been, it was not all it would have been had it received the attention of more loving hearts and the assistance of more helping hands. It came and has now apparently passed away, leaving us to wonder whether or not it has left its footprints so that others who may come after can by some heroic effort accomplish its object and purpose.

It is also a custom when speaking in memory of the dead, if the deceased displayed any acts of heroism on the eve of his death, or gave utterance to some soul-inspiring words, that these should be duly extolled. But, Mr. Chairman, my subject did not have an opportunity either to display heroism or to speak a word. It was subjected to the most cruel punishment imaginable—suffocacation in the pigeonholes of this committee. So much, Mr. Chairman, for its life and its fate, save and except who knows that the time may yet come when the vicious rules of this House will be so far modified that there will be a grand and a glorious resurrection of its victims. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Sir, as this resolution has been cast aside as a thing of no moment, I beg of you to remember that "the stone the builders rejected became the chief corner stone."

But what of its object and purpose? Did it come in the interest of peace, happiness, and the betterment of mankind, or did it come for avarice and greed? Did it come championing the cause of equality or inequality? Did it come as a messenger for the masses or for the classes? It is a trite saying that "coming events cast their shadows before." Sir, events have taken place in this House since the convening of this Congress which foretold the death of this resolution. When I heard one of the distinguished leaders on the Republican side, in closing the argument—no, not argument, but sophistries—in behalf of the Philippine tariff bill, deny that the power to govern is derived from the consent of the governed, and that the old maxim stated an untruth; when I heard it asserted that we should judge of the capabilities of a foreign nation for self-government, and that it was our duty to invade their country against their wish and desire and to assume to govern and control them as subjects over their protest, then I knew this resolution's doom was sealed.

When I observed that the policy of the majority in this House was to trample under foot the Declaration of Independence as a thing of no moment, and when I heard the cry that we should become a world power by force of arms, then I knew that reason had left her throne and that avarice and greed were rampant in this House. I then knew that justice and equality dare not appeal to such a sentiment. But, Mr. Chairman, I ask why should this resolution be subjected to such cruel punishment? It sang no new song, it preached no new doctrine, it advocated no fad. Government ownership of the telegraph is nothing new. The ultimate object and purpose sought by this resolution is not original. So much has been written and said in behalf of Government ownership of the telegraph that nothing new remains to be said. Repetition, tedious repetition, is all that is left in the discussion of the question.

The most eminent men in this nation have championed Government ownership of the telegraph lines. As far back as 1844 Henry Clay, the gifted orator and astute statesman, gave forth these words of warning. He said: "It is quite manifest that the telegraph is destined to exert great influence on the business affairs of society. In the hands of private individuals they will be able to monopolize intelligence and to perform the greatest operations in commerce and other departments of business. I think such an engine should be exclusively under the control of the Government." Such men as Sumner, Grant, Edmunds, Hamlin, Chandler, Dawes, Butler, and others were all earnest advocates of Government ownership.

Postmasters-General Johnson, Randall, Maynard, Howe, Creswell, and Wanamaker were zealous advocates of such ownership. Boards of trade, labor organizations, chambers of commerce, legislatures, and city councils have at one time or another petitioned for the same. Some of the most influential metropolitan papers of the country have advocated Government ownership. In fact, sir, the farmer, the merchant, the mechanic, and the laboring classes all demand it. Is it not strange that with such a sentiment and with such a consensus of opinion this mighty and powerful nation has been unable to accomplish this purpose? Is it not strange that when we boast of our marvelous progress and improvement the Government has not adopted a plan whereby we could convey intelligence in the quickest and most improved manner?

Is it not strange that the Government, the sole object and purpose of which is the welfare of its citizens and to bestow the greatest good to the greatest number, permits private interest to usurp the rights of the public? Notwithstanding the great unanimity for Government ownership of the telegraph, there has been and is to-day one active and energetic opposition, and this is confined to a few capitalists who insist on the exclusive right to transmit our language by the electric current. They are aided and assisted by a select number of politicians who in some manner and in some way have been able to delay legislation and by artful words and facile pen make it impossible for the friends of Government ownership to agree upon any plan. In some way and in some manner the enemies of Government ownership have been able to poison the minds of its friends against each and every plan which has been suggested for such ownership.

It is not my purpose to say anything harsh or unkind of or concerning the capitalists. When we give a person the authority to do a given thing, we should not criticise him for the act performed. We are constantly told that this is the age of "the survival of the fittest," and our present policy seems to justify us in getting all we can and keeping all we get. Therefore, it is but a waste of time to heap opprobrious epithets upon the capitalists, as they are simply doing what we, the people, have by our acts and conduct said they could do. We have resolved, but we have never executed. We have declaimed, but we have never performed. We have permitted private interests to supplant the rights of the public with only a feeble protest. If the friends of Government ownership would concentrate their forces, if they would agree upon a plan for the accomplishment of such ownership, we would not delay much longer righting the great wrongs from which we have suffered. The trouble has been and is to-day that when a plan is suggested for Government ownership its friends immediately criticise and find fault with the plan, and we have a confusion of ideas and tongues.

I stand to-day to plead for concert of action. Let us be of one mind and of one purpose. Let us agree upon some plan and then accept for our motto that of the grand old Commonwealth of Kentucky, "United we stand, divided we fall." Let us remember that no plan on which we may agree will be perfect and free from criticism. Let us remember that whatever mistakes we may make in the adoption of a plan will be amply recompensed in the accomplishment of a purpose. I did not offer this resolution as one of perfection. I did not offer it as the best that the mind might conceive. I understand and know that objections may be made to this as well as to any other plan, but why should the friends of Government ownership seriously object to this plan? I can understand that if you are not a friend of Government ownership this plan is objectionable, as any other would be, but if you are honestly and in good faith in favor of such ownership, I invite your careful consideration of the plan which I have suggested. It simply seeks to carry out the object and purpose intended when the franchise was granted. This resolution discloses that at the time the franchise was granted the Government reserved the right to purchase the property, its value to be determined by appraisers.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me an inquiry at this point?

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. Has the gentleman examined the provision close enough to say whether if the Government purchases it must buy all of its property, physical or otherwise, or only that which is used in the operation of its line?

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. I have no objections to giving the gentleman my opinion with reference to that matter, yet in my judgment the question is not at present germane to the issue involved. I had not intended discussing the legal phase of this matter, because, in my judgment, it would be more appropriate upon a report made by the appraisers who would be appointed under this resolution. The resolution simply provides for the appraisement of the property, this appraisement to be reported to Congress, and then the matter would be subject to a general discussion as to the property appraised and the respective rights of the Government and the companies.

However, I am perfectly willing to state that in my judgment there is not a lawyer but who will agree that this reservation or compact gave the Government better terms than under the law of eminent domain. If this was not so intended, then it was meaningless and a waste of words. It is also my opinion that this compact only contemplates that the Government may purchase such property as is used in the operation of the lines. In its very nature it could not mean that the Government would be under obligations to purchase all the property of the corporation which is not necessary and not used in and about the operation of its lines. The company may own real estate; it may invest its money in different ways, and hold property in the name of the company, and yet the Government would be under no obligation to purchase such property because it is not used in the operation of the lines, but is the accumulation and profits of such an operation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this resolution proceeds upon the principle of law that every individual will do that which is right. Inasmuch as it was provided that the value of this property should be determined by appraisers we have no right to assume that an unreasonable, unfair, and fictitious value will be placed on this property. While we have had many investigations as to the feasibility of Government ownership and its probable cost and expense, yet we have never made a definite proposition to either of these companies as to what we would be willing to give, nor have we ever received from either of them a definite statement as to what they would take. It is conceded by all friends of Government ownership that if these companies would sell at a just and a reasonable price it would be the most sensible thing for this Government to purchase. The plan suggested in this resolution is an ordinary business proposition.

If I have property for sale, either voluntarily or by operation of law, it is the duty of the individual to first determine whether or not he desires to become the owner of that property, and if he so desires, then determine whether or not he is willing to pay the price. This resolution proceeds upon the theory that we desire Government ownership. Of course, those who are opposed to Government ownership, as we have heretofore suggested, would be against this resolution or any other plan which had that for its object and purpose. Therefore, conceding that you are in favor of Government ownership, in my judgment, this resolution is a practical solution as to how to obtain it. You should bear in mind that there is nothing in this resolution which commits the Government to the acceptance of the report of the appraisers, but, upon the contrary, it expressly provides that the report shall be submitted to Congress, and it is for Congress to determine whether or not it will approve the same.

There is nothing drastic in this measure, nor does it seek to confiscate property. It simply assumes that a just, fair, and equitable appraisement will be made. For my part I am unwilling to pay something for nothing, and I am sure there is not a member of this House who will not consent to this statement. Nor do I desire to take something for nothing, and I feel sure that there is not a member in this House but who agrees with this statement. This resolution makes no fight on capital. As the laborer is worthy of his hire, so should capital receive just and fair compensation for its investment. I wage no war against the capitalist, but I strive to do that which is for the betterment of my fellow-citizens as I see and understand it. If in my effort to accomplish this purpose capital stands as a barrier, then it must give way to that inexorable law of the greatest good to the greatest number, for the rights of the many are paramount to those of the few. If the report of the appraisers is unfair and inequitable, then we are not compelled to accept the same, and yet the report may be valuable information to aid us in taking the next and second step for Government ownership. The cost and expense incident to carrying out the terms of this resolution would not exceed $20,000, which would be a mere bagatelle compared to the good that would be accomplished and to what we have heretofore paid for investigations.

Mr. Chairman, by this resolution we give the two companies an opportunity to dispose of their property at a fair and reasonable valuation, and if they refuse to accept the opportunity thus offered the fault will not be ours. If they refuse a fair and equitable price, then this resolution paves the way for another step in behalf of Government ownership. By this resolution we show our good faith and that we are willing to give the companies an opportunity to make a disposition of their property on reasonable terms. Upon their refusal so to do, then we should introduce a bill establishing schedule rates for telegraph companies and at the same time providing for the Government to erect, purchase, operate, and maintain a postal telegraph. Then let us proceed to build, not all at once nor in a year or several years, but let our progress be as fast as good judgment and common business sense will permit. If, during the time we are building, either of these companies desires to sell its lines or any part thereof at a price which we think is reasonable, fair, and equitable, then we can purchase.

In my judgment, when the companies understand and know that the Government will have, own, and operate its telegraph lines, and that it is proceeding as fast as possible to accomplish that object and purpose, they will be exceedingly anxious and willing to meet us on just terms and at a reasonable price. So long as we dally, so long as we hesitate, so long as we falter, just so long will these private companies govern and control the means of transmitting the English language by the electric current. Just so long as we delay legislation for Government ownership, so long will there be a monopoly for the transmission of our language. and the masses of our people will be the victims.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I beg for some affirmative act on the part of the Government for the postal telegraph, knowing how necessary it is that a start be made at once, as it will take many years to accomplish the undertaking.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption for a question?

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. Would the recent experiments of Marconi with wireless telegraphy affect the question of Government ownership of the present system?

Mr. JACKSON of Kansas. I am very glad to give the gentleman my views with reference to this question. It seems to be one which has been discussed more or less in connection with Government ownership. I have received many letters from different parts of the country asking substantially the same question. In each letter the writer assures me that he is for Government ownership, but doubts the wisdom of doing anything just now by reason of wireless telegraphy. In many papers the editors of which I know to be heartily in favor of Government ownership the same suggestion has been made. I have given the matter some thought and have read the views of different experts. From all I can learn there is nothing yet which gives us any assurance that wireless telegraphy will be a commercial success. I do not mean to underestimate the invention. Indeed, a man would be a fool to prophesy as to what to-morrow will bring forth in either the physical or scientific world.

This is an age of progress, growth, and improvement, and the wonders of to-day will be the common things of to-morrow. The fact that electricity travels in a wave is not new or original, but the wonder is that an instrument has been invented to receive the impression so that it may become intelligible. Two things are necessary for the commercial success of telegraphy. They are secrecy and certainty. As an illustration, if you desire to send a message from here to New York by the wireless system, the wave by which you undertake to send this message goes in every direction and extends to the uttermost parts of our country. While seeking to send your message only to New York, it would also go by the wave to San Francisco or New Orleans. Marconi makes no claim that he can control the direction of the wave, and until some instrument is invented which will only receive from its companion sender there can be no secrecy in this system, and without secrecy it will not be accepted by the commercial world. Then, again, we have no assurance of its certainty. It travels by waves, and is therefore subject to all the elements. I am sure I could not make a better answer or explain more satisfactorily than by reading the opinion of Hiram Maxim, of London, as given in the papers a few days ago:

An enemy in time of war might set up a wave-making apparatus of very great power, giving off waves of all amplitude, and making it absolutely impossible to work any system of wireless telegraphy.

The attuning of a transmitter or receiver to a certain pitch is only feasible to a limited extent—say a dozen different kinds of waves. Supposing that in war two hostile fleets were concerned, No. 1 depending on the ordinary system of signaling, No. 2 depending on wireless telegraphy. It would be possible to provide fleet No. 1 with apparatus for making such a confusion of waves as to render the apparatus of fleet No. 2 absolutely useless.

Marconi now has the atmosphere to himself, but when others enter the field and all are making their little waves, though they may not interfere with each other, nevertheless the operator who receives them and reduces them to the English language will have a rather difficult task.

The Marconi system undoubtedly has enormous value, chiefly for ships signaling each other or with the shore during fogs. The cable companies and Marconi can both live in the same world in perfect accord. One system will not interfere with the other. The Marconi system can perform new services without encroaching on the cable companies' sphere.

You are to understand from this that I am no skeptic, and I refuse to be placed in the position of a prophet. For myself, I would not be surprised at anything which may happen in the scientific world, but simply insist that the present experiments with wireless telegraphy should not deter us from taking the first step for Government ownership. If this resolution should pass, it possibly would take several years to consummate the deal, and before the Government accepted or declined the appraisement if wireless telegraphy should have demonstrated its commercial success, then we need not proceed further along the line suggested in this resolution. This sentiment of delay, as suggested by wireless telegraphy, has never contributed to our growth, progress, and improvement. It did not subdue our prairies or build our cities. It never built a railroad, ship, or boat. Delay has nothing in common with progress. It is a sworn enemy of industry, and without industry we have degeneration. Suppose I should suggest that it would be foolish to build any more railroads, boats, or ships because Santos-Dumont has navigated around Eiffel Tower? But a few days ago I read this dispatch in the morning papers:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., February 7.

The Myers Transportation Company, of Pittsburg, incorporated here yesterday, states that the company is "to manufacture, build, operate, and equip airships, and to engage in the business of transporting freight and passengers through the air."

The authorized capital is $100,000.

The incorporators are G. F. Myers, C. M. Thorp, S. L. Ruslander, of Pittsburg, and J. R. Windle and G. F. Rubner, of Allegheny.

Now, our Republican friends are insisting on a ship subsidy, and I am sure all of my Democratic brethren are against the measure; but if the only argument we can urge is the experiment of Dumont with his flying machine, and that nothing should be done with reference to our building ships until that had been fully investigated, I feel confident that you would regard the argument as foolish. Yet who knows but that airships may come, and no one can tell when that will be. We can not question the possibilities of the future. Many marvelous things in the physical and scientific world will come in God's own appointed time, and until they do come we deal with conditions which confront us. God forbid that this mighty and powerful nation should wait for some inventive genius to relieve us of the burdens of monopoly.

Mr. Chairman, the necessity for Government ownership of the telegraph is based on the elementary principle of justice and right. The fundamental object and purpose of the Government is life, liberty, and happiness. It is not mercenary. It is not for dollars and cents. It is not to amass fortunes, but for justice, human development, pure lives, and happy homes. When the Government loses sight of this object and purpose, then it ceases to be that for which it was created. In order that its object and purpose may be accomplished it is necessary that it should champion—yes, practice—"equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none." Any infringement on this self-evident truth, any impairment of the rights thus conferred can not be other than hurtful to our institutions and citizens. The supreme test for the perpetuity of a republican form of government is manhood, virtue, progress, and industry. Wealth when rightly obtained is beneficial, but should be regarded as the crude material for a higher and a nobler civilization. Therefore, Congress in legislating should always have in mind the peace, happiness, and welfare of the American people.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the individual should be unmindful of his duty and indifferent to his responsibilities. I do not believe that the Government should do for the individual that which he could by industry and the exercise of his political rights do for himself; but, sir, I maintain that on matters which are public and which the individual in the very nature of things can not do for himself it is the duty of the Government to guard and protect those public rights. When this Government was created, it was recognized by the fathers that the individual could not with convenience and dispatch, yea, that he could not successfully follow his vocation in life and at the same time carry his messages to the uttermost parts of the country, and therefore the Government undertook to do it for him by our postal system.

The reason which suggested the postal system is the same reason which suggests the necessity for Government ownership of the telegraph. In the very nature of things the individual can not send intelligence by the electric current. He is dependent wholly upon some one else. The telegraph has become a part of our commercial life. Under our present system the individual is subject to the convenience, the extortion, and the pleasure of the private company in doing that which has long since become recognized as a public necessity. We have recognized the necessity of the electric current to transmit intelligence, and it is the modern and improved means for transmission, yet we subject the individual to the mercy of a few capitalists. The capitalists are selfish. The question of service is only an incident to the profit they can derive from the business. They only seek territory for operation where a handsome dividend will be paid.

The question of service is not the controlling thought, but it is a question of dividends. The Government does not consider the question of dividends, but of service. If the Government were the owner of the telegraph, there would be no discrimination in favor of certain classes at the expense of others. The Wall-street speculator would have no advantage over the farmer or tradesman. Our present telegraph system is not as great as it should be. It should serve the public as a whole. Now, the question is, How large a dividend can be declared on about seventy millions of watered stock? If the Government were the owner of the telegraph lines, it could place an office in each and every post-office in the country, and thereby the farmer, the laborer, and the mechanic could enjoy the service of the same.

The charges for service of the telegraph in the hands of the private company are unreasonable and unjust and founded solely on profits and large dividends. If the Government were the owner, the charges would be decreased and the service increased. They tell us that the private company must be confined to business territory, and speak of Wall street, the metropolitan cities, boards of trade, and chambers of commerce as having paramount rights. We recognize their necessity and importance, but insist that there are other business interests which of right should be considered. The man who tills the soil has a business interest; the man who feeds the cattle and hogs has a business interest; the man who delves in the bosom of mother earth and extracts therefrom its precious ore has a business interest. Yea, the great producing classes of this nation have a business interest, and they receive the least benefit from the present system of telegraph.

Be it said to our shame that Canada and America are the only two highly civilized nations that have not accepted the most improved way of transmitting intelligence. Let us keep pace with the times. Let us more fully realize the object and purpose of this Government and strive to so legislate that it will bring peace, happiness, and prosperity to our own people. Let us stop this hypocritical pretense of benevolent assimilation. Let us cease this cry of a world power by force and arms until at least we can deal justly and fairly with our own citizens in our own land and under our own flag.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, some few days since I took occasion to express my views on the subject of the Pacific telegraphic cable; that is, whether Government ownership or individual ownership should prevail in reference to that enterprise. Mr. Chairman, I would not trespass any further upon the indulgence or the kindness of this House had it not been for the remarks just made by the gentleman from Michigan of a character personal to myself.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, who has taken occasion to refer to me in a certain manner, is at present out of his seat. I am glad to see that he has just entered the House. There is one thing that I will say about the gentleman from Michigan: He has the most remarkable, as well as the most unique, and I think the most exclusive, facilities for reaching the public ear in advance of the delivery of his speeches; more so, probably, than any gentleman on this floor.

In the remark just made, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to reflect upon the members of the "press gallery" in any manner whatsoever. My intercourse with them and my observation is that they are gentlemen of the very highest character and are disposed to treat all just and fair alike. I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, not my own speech, but the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], which, if you will permit the expression, has been "lying in soak" for two weeks from to-day. I say that is something quite singular. Now, I do not intend to complain of what purports to be his speech in any way or manner—I know that is sometimes customary—but what I do complain of, Mr. Chairman, is the caption of what purported to be the gentleman's speech, which has been in the hands of correspondents for two weeks from to-day and which reflects upon me personally, or impugns my motive, appearing as though it were written by a correspondent, while in fact and in truth, as I believe, it was written by the gentleman from Michigan himself. I read now the caption of the speech that he has given out to the correspondents and which has been in their hands for two weeks past. What is it? It is as follows:

Representative CORLISS, of Michigan, author of the bill to construct a Government cable to Manila, has taken grave offense at the language of Representative RICHARDSON of Alabama, who took occasion yesterday to attack the bill and its author. To-day Representative CORLISS made a sharp rejoinder to Representative RICHARDSON, in which he went at the Commercial Cable Company, which is opposing the bill, "hammer and tongs," questioning the sincerity of Mr. RICHARDSON and intimating very broadly that he had some ulterior motive in making his speech against the bill.

That is the part to which I object, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman improperly makes a correspondent, as the caption of his speech, use language that questions the sincerity of my motives, when he wrote it himself. Armed with that caption, I would have been authorized and allowed, under a "question of privilege," to have asked the respectful attention of this House.

Mr. CORLISS. Surely the gentleman does not make the charge that I wrote any articles for newspapers?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am bound, from the circumstances and surroundings, to say that I believe you wrote that caption.

Mr. CORLISS. I want to say to you that that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. How is it there, then?

Mr. CORLISS. I do not know, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. "Referring to Mr. RICHARDSON as follows"——

Mr. CORLISS. Well, sir; I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. This caption accompanied your speech when it was placed in the hands of the correspondents and has been a part and parcel of it ever since. You made an addition to the speech a short time since and that was attached to the same caption.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. CORLISS. I submit there is no justification for any such statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, I am going on. I say that I found it in this condition, all printed on the same paper—caption and speech. Mr. Chairman, having read the caption, I now wish to read a few extracts from the gentleman's speech, in which he took occasion to speak of myself.

Here is the first one I call attention to:

Does he desire to be confronted in his next campaign with the charge that during his first session in Congress he sought to uphold the hands of a cable monopoly?

Mr. Chairman, there is just about as much truth as to facts in that paragraph as there is in any paragraph or statement that the gentleman has made on this floor during his three speeches which he has so industriously and assiduously scattered throughout the country. In the first place, let me say that I did not expect the gentleman from Michigan to know that I was in the Fifty-sixth Congress. Of course I did not expect that, but by examining the records he could have found out the fact that I was in the Fifty-sixth Congress. So there is an error at the start. My information is that the gentleman entered the Fifty-fourth Congress. He has been through the Fifty-fifth and the Fifty-sixth and is now a member of the Fifty-seventh. In what I hope was an unobtrusive way, looking on to catch the drift of matters and the rules of the House and all its entanglements in a quiet manner, I have observed that sometimes a long term as member in Congress for different sessions succeeding each other is a great benefit to the member himself and to his constituents, and sometimes it is not. Which one of the class of the "sometimes" the gentleman from Michigan belongs I will leave to the impartial verdict of this House.

Again, Mr. Chairman, he says about me, and I read from the same speech:

Why did not the gentleman from Alabama wait until the consideration of this measure had been properly before the House? What purpose has the gentleman in mind or object to obtain in rushing to the defense of this corporation? From my long experience in the practice of the profession to which the gentleman belongs, I am led to believe that there is a motive back of every act in human life, whether in private or official capacity, and I would be glad if the gentleman would enlighten us upon the subject and explain his own zeal and motive upon this question.

Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with the gentleman from Michigan. I know of no special reason why, as a member that committee, I or any other member having equal rights and privileges with the gentleman from Michigan should sit still and allow him, without contradiction, to make three speeches disseminating alleged facts that are erroneous and multiplying misstatements upon this great question. I ask

"Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he hath grown so great?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to allow any of these personal insinuations to divert me. I take them in the right spirit, fully conscious of what my motives are, knowing that consciousness of that kind gives courage at all times and under all circumstances to a man to speak his honest sentiments. I have not the remotest fear that my motives will be misjudged by this House. I am not going to let these matters divert me from what the real issue is. "The raw head and bloody bones" nursery pictures and tales conjured from the fertile mind of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] in denouncing monopolies are in my judgment the veriest claptrap. They are an appeal to the "peanut gallery" of the country and ought not to have any consideration at the hands of the members of this House or of the country.

Why, look for a moment, if you please. I said that he had wonderful facilities for reaching the public. Why, would you recognize this picture which I have here? Suppose I were an artist and could transform it and put it upon the pages of my speech and send it to the country. I am told my friend is disseminating these pictures, which represent a great anaconda, an octopus stretching from San Francisco to Manila, in the Philippine Islands, and my friend CORLISS standing there with his little sling to slay the great Goliath. Here is the picture. But such matters shall not take me away from the great business proposition—the economic question of dollars and cents involved in the construction and ownership of the Pacific cable. I am no capitalist nor monopolist. This is chiefly a business question, and as such it will and ought to be considered.

What is this proposition that we have to discuss? The gentleman from Michigan and his friends propose that the Government of the United States shall lay this cable from the coast of California to Manila at a cost, on a conservative estimate, of $15,000,000. What next? That the annual outlay for its maintainance will be $1,500,000; that the reasonable annual income that the Government can expect to receive will not exceed $150,000. That is the proposition that they make, and that is the proposition that this House will pass upon.

What is the counter proposition? I call the attention of the House to it. I am not basing my contention in favor of private ownership and a private corporation building this cable at this time upon my opposition to the Federal Government invading the field of private enterprise. We know what the result of that is. The result is that it destroys industry and enterprise, fossilizes management, prevents improvements, blocks progress, and finally results in political revolution. That is the experience of Great Britain to-day. She is realizing the same effect that she realized under the old trade guilds, which the first Reform Parliament of 1833 wiped from the statute books. The facts were fully developed a short time since at a dinner given by a branch of the London Chamber of Commerce to Robert P. Porter, American statistician, that Government ownership subjects cities and towns to the most grasping monopolies. These proceedings have been published.

What is the proposition for which we are contending? It is this: Here is the "Commercial Pacific Cable Company," competent, qualified, financially and otherwise, experienced in its work, with men of the necessary skill. They propose to build this cable from the coast of California to Manila by January, 1905, without a single dollar of cost, aid, or subsidy from the Government. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that strikes the common sense and the business sense of the country with some force. What next do we find about this Commercial Pacific Cable Company? They have entered into a contract to build this cable from San Francisco to Honolulu and to complete it by the 1st day of January, 1903. They have expended on that contract $180,000. It will cost them to build to Honolulu something over $2,000,000. It is conceded by everybody and unquestioned by anyone, under the evidence that was submitted to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, that a line from California to Honolulu could not possibly pay the running expenses; that there was not enough business there to justify the laying of such a line.

Then I say that when this company gives such an earnest evidence as the spending of over $2,000,000, it is an absolute guaranty that it will proceed and build the line to Manila, where the business will pay. Now, what is the next guarantee made by the Commercial Pacific Cable Company? It proposes to build an all-American line, if possible, and, as said before, there is no question about that, except the deep water around Guam. What else does it propose? It proposes to take Government messages at half rates, and not only that, but that the Postmaster-General shall regulate the cable rate, and that the Secretary of State, whenever in his opinion an emergency arises, shall have the right, in the name of the Government of the United States, to take possession of that line and to use it and operate it for the Government until the necessity is past. And what else does it do? These are the questions that we propound to those who raise this cry of "monopoly and octopus." It proposes to reduce existing rates from $1.66 per word to $1 per word from San Francisco to Manila and $1 to China.

What else does it do? Why this company gives a guaranty—pledges itself that the Government can step in and buy the cable the moment it sees proper at its appraised value, the appraisers being agreed upon in the usual way. Now, I say, what stronger argument, what more convincing facts, can I give for the purity of my motive for my advocacy of private ownership than the simple business proposition that has been stated? Why, I ask, with all of these safeguards, should we be willing to thrust the Government, at the behests of private interests and dictation, into a line of policy of Government ownership, invading private enterprise, destroying private energy and industry, by bringing the people into competition with its immense resources? Now, right on that line I will read just for one moment. There is something behind all this. We will find it and see it.

Mr. Scrymser, who is to-day advocating Government ownership (standing by my friend from Michigan), who has changed his front from what he was a few years ago. Listen to what he says, and I read from the hearings of the committee of 1900:

Our route is known as the "Via Galveston" route, and with that route we are in connection with the Western Union and its allied cables, and also with the Commercial Cable Company. All these foreign cable companies are interested in diverting South American European traffic this way in order that they shall get their portion of tolls from London to New York, or London to Galveston, as the case may be. A careful study of our telegraph records shows that about 1,470 customers do the whole telegraph business of Central and South America. Of that 1,470 customers 400 do 90 per cent of the whole traffic, and of those 400 who do 90 per cent of the whole traffic 300 are European, thereby showing that only about 100 of them are American firms and corporations. It stands to reason that the establishment of a United States Government Pacific cable will be for the sole benefit of about 100 American firms and 300 European firms. I ask you, gentleman, if it is fair to tax 75,000,000 American people to the extent of $25,000,000 for the benefit of 400 firms who are to use a Pacific cable—300 of whom are Europeans?

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that interrogatory of Mr. Scrymser to-day as part of my remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, any Pacific cable that the Government would build will necessarily stop at Manila, unless we propose to expend untold millions in building a cable around the world. The bill which the gentleman introduced admits that it is to stop at Manila. I respectfully call attention to another feature of that bill that has not heretofore been commented upon, and it is this: I read first section 8 of the bill that has been eliminated, and it will give you some idea why this was done. Who is moving in it? Where is the great octopus and anaconda? Where is the great combination and monopoly? That is the question that will propound itself in the face of facts to these business men in this House.

SEC. 8. That for the promotion of our commercial interests, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to enter into negotiations and establish international and governmental cable communications with Japan between the island of Luzon and Formosa, and with China, between the island of Luzon and some commercially desirable Chinese port.

Now, that was stricken out from the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. At whose suggestion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And this was substituted:

SEC. 8. That for the promotion of our commercial and other interests, the Postmaster-General, Secretary of War, and Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to enter into negotiations and establish cable communication through existing cable lines.

It does not stop there.

Or cable lines hereafter constructed.

There is the gist and the gravamen of that clause. Who is going to construct them? I read now something that will shed light on that transaction from the testimony that was taken before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The chairman was questioning Mr. Clark who is the managing man and vice-president of the great Western Union Telegraph Company. I have no words of abuse for this or any other company:

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand your statement, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company now have arrangements by which they could gather up and could distribute general telegraphic business from Manila throughout China and Japan, and so forth?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They have that arrangement now?

Mr. CLARK. As I understand it; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then they have an arrangement through the ownership of the Postal Telegraph Company by which they could gather up and distribute messages here in the United States?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have that also here in the United States?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not have that facility from Manila, we will say, or from the Philippine Islands, throughout China and Japan?

Mr. CLARK. Only as the business is apportioned by the Eastern Company now.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no right?

Mr. CLARK. We have no right.

The CHAIRMAN. No right at this time?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Pacific Cable Company propose to put in that missing link at their own expense?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Connecting San Francisco with the islands; and they, you think, would use their company here, in the United States?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To the exclusion of your own?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, while they are willing to do all this at their own expense, you object to their doing it unless your own company can be a participant in the advantages of building that cable?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; I say that a Government cable will serve all a great deal better and give us our share—that is the whole truth of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you want some method adopted by which, without any additional expense to you—to your company—you can have these advantages which the other company is willing to pay for?

Mr. CLARK. That is my chief desire; yes, sir.

There is the milk in the cocoanut. They are trying to use the Government to pull out "the hot chestnuts" from the fire for them. They get the benefit of the expenditure of a vast amount of money by the Government.

What else in that connection? Why, Mr. Clark, vice-president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, says: "But they are laying one, so they say. I will say frankly that we are not willing to invest $12,000,000 in that enterprise."

And listen, again, Mr. Chairman. Here is Mr. Baylies, who was the attorney for the Western Union Company:

The CHAIRMAN. When you have appeared before this committee on other occasions you were not, my recollection is, in favor of a governmental cable?

Mr. BAYLIES. No, sir; we strongly opposed it.

The CHAIRMAN. At that time you came asking substantially for a contract with the Government that would be in the nature of aid to your enterprise?

Mr. BAYLIES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You now propose, if the Government cable is established, to exercise your right, which you now possess, of the construction of a cable from Manila to China and Japan?

Mr. BAYLIES. If we have the Government's assistance to the extent of breaking up the existing monopoly by building a cable to the Philippines; the money for the rest we propose to supply.

The CHAIRMAN. You are now an advocate of the Government building a link between your other cables that may land in this country and Manila and the cables which you propose to establish between Manila and other points?

Mr. BAYLIES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are still here asking for aid from the Government, but simply in a different form?

Mr. BAYLIES. We are asking its moral support, not its financial aid.

The CHAIRMAN. You ask its financial aid in the construction of the link in the cable that you proposed yourself to build two years ago with a subsidy?

Mr. BAYLIES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that your attitude of interest is perhaps as great now as then, but simply changed in form?

Mr. BAYLIES. That is also true. We certainly have been working for a great many years to establish a Pacific cable, and this is the only way of doing it.

So, Mr. Chairman, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company proposes to build this link between the coast of California and Manila at their own expense, and the Western Union Telegraph Company, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Scrymser, with the several companies he represents, do not want it done, because, they say, "We want the Government to do it and for us to get the benefit of it." Which proposition, as a business matter, will this House accept?

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Does not the gentleman admit that there are exclusive privileges existing on the island of Guam and the Philippines that would deny to the Western Union Company or any other interest in this country the right to lay a cable, if this one was permitted, and would deny it until 1940?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have the same objection to the gentleman's question that the Tennessee lawyer had to the demurrer that was interposed in a case once in court. The judge asked him once or twice what his objection to the demurrer was, and he said, "Why, judge, it is too long." [Laughter.] The gentleman's question is too long. I do not know and I do not admit that it is true at all.

That is not my information. What I know is that the great bugaboo, "jack-o'-lantern" light that the gentleman from Michigan so persistently follows through the murky and miry swamp of his imagination is that the Eastern Extension Pacific Cable Company that runs from Manila to Hongkong, about 700 miles, is the one company that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company will form a combination with to regulate through rates. It is unnecessary to discuss the question of connections. The fact is that under the Spanish grant giving the Eastern Extension Cable Company the right to lay the line from Manila to Hongkong can be bought to-day for $25,000 annually for the balance of the lease of about sixteen years. I know that is a fact, and that disposes of that matter.

Now, I will revert to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan. I pass by as idle and not deserving attention the references of the gentleman to my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], our minority leader, as to what had been said about him in the State of Michigan in the confusion of our identity. We will be in a woeful condition of distress and "dire straits" when the Democratic party needs the defense of my friend from Michigan. We should certainly be in a bad, bad fix. [Laughter.] We do not ask that. I certainly can bear my name being connected with the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, if he can.

Now, again, the gentleman says that "Great Britain never offered the privilege of building a cable to Vancouver through the Pacific to a private company; so that Mr. RICHARDSON was mistaken when he said it had." What about that? Now, I call this to the attention, Mr. Chairman, of the House, and this is the report of the committee appointed to consider the proposal for laying a telegraph cable between British North America and the colonies of Australasia. They say:

In arriving at this conclusion—

This is the British committee speaking—they do not underrate the importance of allowing all commercial undertakings to be carried out whenever possible by private enterprise unassisted by the Government.

"Whenever possible." What do you understand that language to mean?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks that his colleague may be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The committee says:

In arriving at this conclusion they do not underrate the importance of allowing all commercial undertakings to be carried out whenever possible by private enterprise unassisted by the Government.

The meaning of that is that they could not get any help from private enterprise. It was impracticable. That is all, and there is no other construction to give it. "But," they say, "in the present case there seems to be no possibility that private capital will be forthcoming for the purpose of laying a Pacific cable without a larger subsidy than the Governments interested in the project would be prepared to grant."

That is just what they were doing here in the last Congress, asking a subsidy, and to-day the Commercial Pacific Cable Company comes up and says: "We will build the line; will guarantee it; will safeguard the interests of the Government in times of peace and in war, and will ask no subsidy for doing it whatever."

I refer also to the remarks of Sir John Pender, published in the Electrician Magazine, London, of the 13th day of December, last year, page 308.

The gentleman, in his speech, says:

I repeat that Great Britain has purchased and owns and controls over 20,000 miles of cable, in addition to the one constructed in the Pacific, and it matters not whether she acquired it by direct government construction or obtained it as she did the Suez Canal, by buying stock of a corporation, holding the cables when she desired them for protecting military property and expanding her trade and commerce.

Now, the gentleman has fallen into a fatal error again, if I understand the matter. I read, Mr. Chairman, from a document furnished by the Auditor for the War Department and published some time since in the hearings of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I read from the title, "Cables owned by British Government administration," page 47. The fact is, and it stands uncontradicted, that Great Britain owns two thousand and a fraction—2,016—miles of cable, and the longest cable that she has, according to this report, is 122.63 miles.

Now, what else is there about that? I hold in my hand a map showing the "Submarine and Land Telegraph Systems of the World." If Great Britain owns 20,000 miles, as the gentleman from Michigan says, surely that fact would appear upon this map, which is published by the chief of the bureau. What are the great submarine and land telegraph systems of the world? They are designated upon this map as A, B, C, etc. Here are the names: Anglo-American Telegraph Company, The Commercial Cable Company, Western Union Telegraph Company, Compagnie Francaise du Telegraph, Eastern Telegraph Company, Brazilian Submarine Telegraph Company, Eastern and South African Telegraph Company, Eastern Extension, Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Great Northern Telegraph Company, West India and Panama Telegraph Company, Central and South American Telegraph Company, and German Atlantic Cable Company.

That statement shows, and it can not be contradicted, what are the great submarine and land telegraph systems of the world. The gentleman from Michigan and those who are acting with him are undertaking to show that Great Britain has established all the precedents in connection with this question. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not take any part in this great abuse of corporations and monopolies. There is no argument in that. It appeals simply to prejudice. We should not overlook the vital question of whether we are prepared to establish the precedent of Government ownership, with the untold evils that will rise up to vex and harass us in the wake of such a precedent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have delayed the House longer than I had intended. Tradition—whether true or untrue, I know not—is to the effect that the gentleman from Michigan when he entered Congress for the first time—in the Fifty-fourth Congress—came here as the protégé or the pupil of the much-lamented Governor Pingree, of his State, a man of great national reputation. If that is so, I can easily account for the many startling and appalling idiosyncrasies that the gentleman has demonstrated in this debate about the cable question.

The gentleman from Michigan refers to various commercial organizations that have indorsed Government ownership of the Pacific cable. I refer him to the canceled resolutions of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. I also refer to the letter written to the gentleman from Michigan by the Chamber of Commerce of Baltimore, which I have leave to print.

The letters referred to are as follows:

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Los Angeles, Cal., February 18, 1902.

Commissioner R. R. HAINES,
Manager Postal Telegraph Cable Company, Los Angeles, Cal.

DEAR SIR: Responding to your request of recent date with reference to the chamber's action in the matter of the Pacific cable, will state that the following resolutions were adopted December 18, 1901:

"Whereas the ownership and control of the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands in the Pacific Ocean have greatly advanced the possibilities and commercial progress of our country, and, with the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, will enable our people to develop a merchant marine and advance our trade and commerce with the Orient; and

"Whereas Great Britain has largely controlled the trade and commerce of the seas by the construction, ownership, and control of cable lines and canals: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That a Government cable connecting the islands owned and controlled by our country in the Pacific Ocean is a public necessity for the proper advancement of our trade and commerce, as well as our naval and military protection; also

"Resolved, That such cable should be laid, owned, and controlled by our Government, and operated the same as the Post-Office Department at the least possible expense to the people; that the pending measure, known as the Corliss bill, commends our hearty approval, and in our judgment should be speedily adopted.

"Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be submitted to Congress and a copy thereof be submitted to each Member and Senator of this State."

On January 15, 1902, by resolution introduced by Director Forman, the above action was rescinded, and the plans of the Commercial Cable Company were indorsed.

Yours, very truly, FRANK WIGGINS, Secretary.

BALTIMORE, February 13, 1902.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS,
Chairman, etc.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of some weeks ago addressed to the "Officers and members of the chamber of commerce," relative to the construction, ownership, and control of a Pacific cable extending from California to Hawaii, Manila, Japan, and China by our Government, came duly to hand, and the delay in acknowledging same has been due to our desire to await the report of the committee on law and transportation of this exchange, to which it was referred soon after its receipt by the board of directors. It was not, however, until last Monday, at the regular monthly meeting of the board, that the above committee submitted its report upon the subject, which is reproduced in full herewith.

Your committee reports as follows:

In view of the fact that we have good evidence before us that one of the great ocean cable companies is now laying a cable upon this route, over which the Government will have complete control (see accompanying report of this committee), we would deem it against business principles for the Government to embark in an operation which is both unnecessary and destructive of private rights and enterprise.

This proposition for a Government cable is a new departure, entirely outside of and entirely different from the operation of our Post-Office Department, under whose wing it is proposed the operation of this cable should be conducted. At the same time the Postmaster-General has in his control the fixing of the rates for Government business upon the proposed private cable, and retains in his hands the power to purchase the same in case the Government at any time should see fit to be owner of its own cable lines.

Your committee, therefore, does not recommend the adoption of the "Corliss bill," which recites that a Government cable across the Pacific Ocean is a public necessity, and that such cable shall be laid, owned, and controlled by the Government, and operated in the same manner as the Post-Office Department.

Yours, very truly,
BLANCHARD RANDALL,
DOUGLAS M. WYLIE,
Committee on Law and Transportation.
W. F. WHEATLEY,
Secretary Chamber of Commerce.

BALTIMORE, MD., February 7, 1902.

The President and Board of Directors of the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce.

DEAR SIRS: Your committee on transportation and law begs to report on the question contained in your letter of the 5th of February, inclosing a letter from the Baltimore manager of the Postal Telegraph Cable Company; also a pamphlet entitled "Pacific Cable; Should the Government Parallel the Cable of the Pacific Cable Company?"

Your committee has endeavored to get at the principal points embodied in this pamphlet of 40 pages, published entirely from an ex parte standpoint and giving but one side of the question, namely, that of the Commercial Cable Company.

The history of the case may be summed up in a few words; that in the acquisition of our Pacific island dependencies the Government of this country needed better cable facilities. A Government cable was the first idea. A private corporation, to be granted the subsidy of $300,000 for twenty years, seems to have been the second project. A year or more later the Commercial Pacific Cable Company writes to the Secretary of State that it intends to lay this cable itself, as a business venture, making no conditions and asking no Government help, and proceeded with their own business and in their own way to lay their cable. Other projects for laying Pacific cables are evidently before Congress.

The chamber of commerce is asked to express disapprobation of any other company, but to distinctly state that the Pacific Cable Company, which is backed by the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, is entitled to all encouragement that can be extended to it by the Government. It seems to us that, as this company undertook this work as a business proposition, it is a business question which they and their rivals in business should settle among themselves.

As to the other point—that we should deprecate the passage of bill or bills by Congress which call, first, for a Government cable, and, second, for a subsidy of $300,000 a year for twenty years to a company for the construction and operation of such a cable—it seems to this committee that our honorable body should not bestir itself, or give time to the consideration of such questions, for the reason that the Mackay cable (Pacific Cable Company), now building can be bought by the Government at any time at an appraised value, and the Postmaster-General can himself set the rate of cable tolls for the Government under the post-road act of Congress.

Again, it would seem almost impertinent for this body to warn Congress against so unbusiness-like a proceeding as to subsidize a company with $300,000 per annum for twenty years when another company stands ready to do this work at reasonable, and presumedly at the same, rates, without the additional payment of $5,000,000. We do not think it is the duty of the Chamber of Commerce to so put itself on record.

Respectfully,
BLANCHARD RANDALL,
DOUGLAS M. WYLIE,
Committee on Law and Transportation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now, if the Chairman and gentlemen of the House will excuse me, I would like to repeat a piece of poetry, which, according to my judgment, applies to the conduct of the gentleman from Michigan in this discussion. It comes back to me from the days gone by. It is this:

He wires in and wires out,
Leaving the House still in doubt
Whether the snake that crossed the track
Was coming forward or going back.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question before he takes his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has the floor.

Mr. CORLISS. Before the gentleman from Alabama concludes his remarks, as he has plenty of time, I would like to ask him one or two questions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I did not ask you any, and I do not believe——

Mr. CORLISS. Are you unwilling to answer?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; ask them.

Mr. CORLISS. Have you ever examined the grants held by the Eastern Extension Cable Company over Guam and the Philippine Islands?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have.

Mr. CORLISS. Do they not include exclusive privileges, giving the absolute control——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not think so.

Mr. CORLISS. And the only way they can be obtained is to purchase by Government those rights?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. CORLISS. Does not the gentleman admit that the Commercial Cable Company have made an agreement with the company holding these monopolistic rights for landing privileges?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; in answer to that, Mr. Chairman, I would say the Commercial Pacific Cable Company guarantees that the rate of $1.66 charged now from San Francisco to Manila shall be reduced to $1, not only from San Francisco to Manila, but from San Francisco to China. Do not you admit that?

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman denies——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I will simply play a Yankee habit and answer your question by asking another.

Mr. CORLISS. I will answer your question by saying that they propose to reduce the rate from $1.66 to $1; but I want you to answer my question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And did not the Commercial Cable Company do more in that direction than any other?

Mr. CORLISS. No, sir, never; and I will prove that to the satisfaction of this House. It raised the rate from 12½ cents to 25 cents, by means of a combination.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do not you admit that when the Commercial Cable Company went into operation the Atlantic charges were 50 cents?

Mr. CORLISS. No; they were 12½ cents until they combined, and they raised them to 25 cents.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do not you admit that it was 50 cents, and they went into a cable war and fought it out for two or three years and it was cut down to 12½ cents, and the Commercial Cable Company did that, and that the other companies then "threw up their hands" and cried for help, and asked them to leave it at 25 cents?

Mr. CORLISS. Will you answer the question——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do not you admit that is true?

Mr. CORLISS. It is not true in the way the gentleman states it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, well, we will never agree.

Mr. CORLISS. No, we will not; but I want to ask you this question, and if you want to be fair to the House you will answer it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will be fair, perfectly fair, to the House; but I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken up too much of the time of the House already, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is waiting for his time.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

[Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BURKETT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given fifteen minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman be permitted to continue for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] will listen to me for a moment, there is a great desire on the part of a number of gentlemen to close the general debate to-night. The House, of course, will ultimately do what it desires to do. There are one or two gentlemen who, long before this bill was in Committee of the Whole, asked for time to speak upon it. If my colleague from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] will agree, I will ask that the general debate on this bill close with the session of to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] asks unanimous consent that the general debate upon this bill close to-day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the House adjourn at the regular time, 5 o'clock?

Mr. LOUD. That will be about the time when I think we ought to adjourn.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many intervening speeches will there be between this and 5 o'clock?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know who wants to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will that order interfere with the present list on the Chairman's desk?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; it does.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; it will interfere.

Mr. GRIGGS. I ask my friend from California to let the debate continue for one hour to-morrow?

Mr. LOUD. I will make that request. I withdraw the other, and make the request that the general debate close to-morrow, one hour after we go into Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the general debate close after one hour in Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Before that question is submitted to the House, I should like to state that I want thirty minutes' time to discuss this bill. I want to speak against the subsidy feature of it, and I should like to have it arranged so that I could have the thirty minutes' time to-morrow.

Mr. LOUD. I will then add to the request that the time to-morrow be equally divided between the two sides represented by the gentleman from Virginia and myself, and I will yield the thirty minutes allotted to me to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from California is that the time to-morrow be equally divided.

Mr. LOUD. Between the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from California, and I will yield all my time to-morrow to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California now makes the request for unanimous consent that the debate close after one hour on to-morrow, and that the time to-morrow be equally divided between the two sides, the gentlemen from Virgina [Mr. SWANSON] to control half for that side of the House, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to control the other half. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I want to state to the Chair that on the question to be discussed the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] are on the same side. I wish to be heard on that question when it is discussed; therefore I shall object now.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. TALBERT. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. My point of order is this, that the Committee of the Whole can not fix the time for closing general debate. I ask a ruling by the Chair on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole can agree to close general debate.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the Chair put my request that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] be allowed fifteen minutes further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] be permitted to continue for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that I am on the list for to-night. I do not want to talk to-night, and with the understanding that I can have thirty minutes to-morrow or at some time in the future before the bill is voted on I make no objection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I am in the same position.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Objection to what?

The CHAIRMAN. To the request that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed fifteen minutes additional. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

[Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that there seems to be a desire that the committee should now rise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any agreement about general debate to-morrow?

Mr. LOUD. None whatever. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURKETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM J. GLENN, DOORKEEPER.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. CLAPP on the 5th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1475) for the relief of Jean Louis Legare, of the Dominion of Canada, beg leave to submit the following report:

That the bill be amended by inserting $8,000 in lieu of $13,412, and as so amended report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

This claim is for money expended and for services rendered by Legare in procuring the surrender of Sitting Bull and his band of Indians. After the battle of the Little Big Horn, in the year 1876, in which General Custer was killed, Sitting Bull and his band, being pursued by the army, escaped from the United States into the territory of Canada, stopping in the Wood Mountain region in the Northwest Territory of Canada. The Indians were a constant disturbance to the government of Canada, and were a menace to our own Government through their raids across the line between the two countries, and it was necessary for the United States to maintain a large number of troops on the frontier to protect the citizens from plunder and murder. During the years 1877 to and including 1881 frequent attempts were made to secure their surrender to the authorities of the United States. A commission was sent for that purpose in 1878, but the attempt was not successful; the Indians refused to come back.

In 1879 one Ellison was sent as the agent of Major Brotherton, U. S. A., with provisions and presents, and he endeavored to induce the Indians to come back, but was unable to do so. In 1881 Major Crozier, of the mounted police of Canada, held a council, gave them presents, and tried to induce them to come back. His efforts extended over a period of three months, and a letter was sent to Major Crozier by Major Brotherton, U. S. A., to be read to Sitting Bull. After receiving this letter Major Crozier gave a feast to the Indians and read the letter to them, but Sitting Bull and his band did not have faith in the mounted police and were afraid to come back to the United States.

In this condition of affairs Walter B. Jordan, then a merchant at Miles City, Mont., and now president of the First National Bank there, advised Maj. D. H. Brotherton, who was then in command at Fort Buford, to secure the services of Jean Louis Legare in connection with the return of Sitting Bull and his band. Mr. Jordan had known Legare for a number of years and he introduced Legare to Major Brotherton, assuring the latter that Legare was a man of influence with the Indians and thoroughly reliable. Being convinced that Legare was what Jordan represented him to be, Major Brotherton made an arrangement with him by which he was to exert his efforts to secure the return of the Indians, and he assured Legare that the United States would compensate him well for his services and expenses in that connection.

Legare was then, and for some time previously had been, a trader and freighter, living in a remote region of northwest Canada, and necessarily unfamiliar with the laws of the United States. He had no knowledge or intimation that Major Brotherton, of the Army, was without power to bind his Government by a contract, and the services that he rendered and the money he expended thereafter were in the belief that he had a contract with the United States which would assure reimbursement and compensation. The services and expenditures of Legare are as follows:

(1) 1881, April 20. Provisions, tobacco, and pipes furnished Sitting Bull and followers	$350
(2) Transportation and board for Indians from Wood Mountain, Canada, to Fort Buford, Dak. T., 150 miles, at $32 per Indian:
1881, April 26, 16 Indians	512
1881, May 22, 32 Indians	1,024
1881, July 11, 200 Indians	6,400
(3) Transportation and board of Indians from Fort Buford, Dak. T., to Wood Mountain, Canada, 150 miles, at $32 per Indian:
1881, May 4, 4 Indians	128
1881, June 1, 3 Indians	96
1881, July 19, 1 Indian	32
(4) Provisions furnished 12 lodges of Indians, about 50 or 60 persons, from April 26 to July 2, 1881	990
(5) 1881, July 2. Provisions and tobacco furnished Sitting Bull and followers, 300 Indians	225
(6) 1881, July 3. Twelve sacks of flour furnished Sitting Bull and three headmen, at $12	144
(7) 1881, July 11. One revolver to Sitting Bull	15
(8) 1881, July 11. One looking-glass to Sitting Bull	25
(9) 1881, July 11. To one lodge	12
(10) 1882, April 12. Board and clothing for 1 Indian, 9 months, at $40	360
(11) 1882, April 20. One year's services	3,000
(12) 1882, April 22. One pony, turned over to scout	45
(13) Use of pony, from August 25, 1881, to April 22, 1882	54
Total amount claimed	13,412

Legare, at great bodily peril, entreated the Indians to return to the United States, and as a means of reaching their judgment he made presents to many of them and feasts for all of them. These things he did because he knew the Indian character and knew that by these methods only could he secure favorable action on their part. He fed 50 or 60 of them from April 26 to July 2, 1881; furnished provisions and tobacco for the band at various times, and transported and furnished them with food from Wood Mountain, Canada, to Fort Buford, Dak. T., a distance of 150 miles, through a wild and barren country. He not only transported the Indians in person, but he also carried their tepees, poles, and blankets. He was obliged to carry all the provisions, so as to provide them with everything they required on the way; also to carry wood, and for a part of the way water.

In transporting these Indians, Legare made several journeys, taking a portion of the band each time, and after arriving at Fort Buford and remaining there for a short time, returning to Woody Mountain, taking with him a small number of the Indians to verify his statement that those who surrendered themselves and came over the border were well treated by the United States Government. That the services and expenditures of Legare were appreciated by the officers of the Army is shown by the following correspondence:

FORT BUFORD, D. T., May 29th, 1881.

I have considered it best to retain Mathey's troop, as sending it away would reduce the garrison to one hundred and eighty-six (186) present for duty. I expect more Indians in very soon—perhaps the greater portion of those at Woody Mountain—and it may be some from Sitting Bull at Lake Qu'Appelle. They [are?] at the two places about sixty (60) lodges, in most cases. I am informed, two (2) families to a lodge, and in all about three hundred men, women, and children.

Mr. Legare, a trader at Woody Mountain, who has brought in his last two trips forty-eight (48) Indians, came [brought?] in on the twenty-sixth (26th) instant thirty-two (32); these were sent with the others to Yates. I sent back with him two of those he brought in, after they had seen and talked with their friends here. Mr. Legare tells me that the fact of their friends have [ing?] gone below peaceably, and were so well treated while here, will, he thinks, produce a movement at once of the Indians at Woody Mountain in this direction to surrender, as they are starving where they are, and also that there is now a strong probability that Sitting Bull himself, finding so many of his adherents leaving him, even his own daughter, will have to come in.

I have known Mr. Legare since last summer; he is well known, reliable, and I have every reason, from the way things look now, to believe his impression will be realized. He has been here quite a number of times, but usually very reticent on the subject of Indians company [coming?] in, but is now outspoken, and seems thoroughly convinced that all will come in. With this in view, I thought best to retain Mathey's troop, as I presume all that will come in will be shipped to Yates.

The Indians shipped the other day embarked cheerfully and willingly to all appearance. I sent with them Allison and Running Antelope. Mr. Legare left here yesterday with his train for Woody Mountain; said he would return in about two weeks with all the Indians who desired to come in. He brings these Indians in, hauling their plunder on his carts, and has so far fed them on the way. Can not he be reimbursed in some way?

D. H. BROTHERTON,
Major, Seventh Infantry, Commanding.

Gen. A. H. TERRY,
Commanding Department of Dakota, St. Paul, Minn.

[Telegram.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA,
Fort Snelling, Minn., June 6, 1881.

COMMANDING OFFICER, Fort Buford:

Department commander regrets he has no funds applicable or available for paying Mr. Legare for bringing Indians into Fort Buford to surrender and feeding them en route.

BRECK, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. Legare was not a man of large means, and he spent everything he had except a few dry goods in getting these Indians from Wood Mountain to Fort Buford. He has made repeated efforts through the War Department, the Court of Claims, and Congress to be compensated for his services and expenses, but has never received a dollar from this Government in any way. After failing to get anything through the War Department, he filed a petition in the Court of Claims. Testimony was taken, and the claim was so thoroughly established that no controversy was made as to the facts of his performing the services or to their value, but he was unsuccessful in his litigation for the reason that the court found that Major Brotherton had no authority to contract on behalf of the United States to pay Legare for services rendered or supplies furnished the Indians during their journey to Fort Buford, and the court held that the claim was not a legal demand against the United States cognizable in the Court of Claims for that reason, and it also held that most of the claim was barred by the statute of limitation at the time the suit was commenced, and therefore the petition was dismissed.

This case is No. 15713 in the Court of Claims, and the opinion of the court is reported in 24 Court of Claims, 513.

Since the dismissal of his claim by the Court of Claims, Legare has been constantly endeavoring to obtain relief through Congressional action, and in the Fifty-first Congress the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives reported favorably upon his claim, to the extent of $9,000, but for some reason no bill has ever passed either House for his relief.

Realizing the great importance to both countries of the services rendered by Mr. Legare in thus insuring peace upon the border, the Canadian government, without any request from Legare, and without his knowledge, by act of Parliament voted him the sum of $2,000 as a gratuity. The evidence shows that in expenditures and in services rendered there should be paid Legare $13,412. Of course this is exclusive of interest for the more than twenty years which have elapsed since these things were done. In addition to the expense of transporting the supplies furnished the Indians, from Wood Mountain to Fort Buford—a distance of 150 miles—Legare had to pay duties thereon, ranging from 5 to 40 per cent of their value, to the Canadian government.

The testimony of all the witnesses shows that Legare is a man of the highest integrity. Alexander R. MacDonell, in command of the northwest mounted police, stationed at Wood Mountain Post, testified in the case, in the Court of Claims, that he had known Legare for many years; knew of the services which he had rendered the United States in returning Sitting Bull and his band, and when asked what he knew as to Legare's character, he said:

"Without exception, he is the most honest man I ever met. I do not think he is capable of doing a dishonest act."

In the judgment of your committee, payment of the amount claimed by Legare should be made without further delay, and it will be far from an adequate return for the saving of property and lives and the expenditures for military forces, which would have been made necessary if these Indians had remained in Canada, making forays across the border from time to time. We therefore recommend that the bill do pass for the sum of $8,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JULIA L. HALL.

The bill (S. 1308) for the relief of Mrs. Julia L. Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia, to sell the bonds authorized to be issued under the provisions of the sixth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880, and out of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds to pay and satisfy the claim of Joseph T. H. Hall, of Washington, D. C., now deceased, against the District for $18,664.19, without interest, that being the amount found due him by the judgment of the Court of Claims under date of June 22, 1895, under the provisions of the act approved February 13, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes,' approved June 16, 1880," and to pay that amount to Mrs. Julia L. Hall, his widow.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIRST LIEUT. JOSEPH M. SIMMS.

The bill (S. 3360) for the promotion of First Lieut. Joseph M. Simms, Revenue-Cutter Service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. MARTIN on the 6th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3360) for the promotion of First Lieut. Joseph M. Simms, Revenue-Cutter Service, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass without amendment.

The bill has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 3, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, referring to me the bill S. 3360, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, for the promotion of First Lieut. Joseph M. Simms, Revenue-Cutter Service, now on the "permanent waiting orders" list, to the grade of captain on that list.

The highly creditable and meritorious record of Lieutenant Simms, as set forth in the papers accompanying your letter, which are herewith returned, proves the merit and deserving of that officer. I therefore return the bill and recommend that it be passed without amendment.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
United States Senate.

Following is brief sketch of Lieutenant Simms's record:

He enlisted, in 1861, in the volunteer service, and served as first corporal in District of Columbia Volunteers, in the defense of Washington, for three months, receiving honorable discharge at the expiration of his term.

In August, 1863, was appointed acting master's mate in the United States Navy.

May 5, 1864, the commander of the U. S. S. Daylight, in his report to the admiral on the destruction of Confederate salt works, said:

"Colonel Jourdan informs me that a detachment under the command of Acting Ensign J. W. Willard and Acting Master's Mate J. M. Simms were conspicuous in all their movements, especially in the charge through the thicket under fire."

In April, 1864, while in pursuit of the torpedo boat Squib, he received a slight wound in the face. The officer in charge of the second launch, in his report to the admiral, said:

"I am very gratified to say that Mr. Simms, officer of the piece in the second launch, was remarkably cool, and directed the working of the gun in a most creditable and skillful manner."

During the bombardment of Fort Fisher Mr. Simms had charge of the 11-inch pivot gun on the Minnesota, and commanded a company of 44 men from that ship in the assault upon the fort. When within 50 yards of the fort he was shot, the bullet entering near the right knee, passing upward 14 inches and out at the hip. The executive officer, Lieut. Commander James Parker, wrote as follows to the mother of Mr. Simms:

"Your gallant son yesterday, in assaulting Fort Fisher, was wounded. His wound is not dangerous, though severe. No bones broken. He goes to the naval hospital at Norfolk, Va., by the same vessel with this. His conduct was splendidly gallant, and I regret that he did not escape unhurt. He will be recommended for promotion."

Reference to "Mentions" in official records:

"The conduct of Acting Master's Mate Joseph M. Simms was splendidly gallant.

"Acting Master's Mate Joseph M. Simms and Arthur F. Aldrich are fine young men. Simms I know to be eminently worthy. Both men were severely wounded while in the extreme front; both richly merit their promotion."

Mr. Simms was granted sick leave and taken home.

As late as May, 1865, Mr. Simms was on crutches with two bad openings in thigh and hip. In February, 1866, he was ordered to the South Pacific Squadron; broke down in a year, and was sent to the naval hospital at Washington, having been promoted to acting ensign.

In July, 1868, Simms was appointed third lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service, having received honorable discharge from the Navy.

James Parker, late lieutenant-commander, United States Navy, under date of August 6, 1869, wrote to Lieutenant Simms as follows:

"It affords me pleasure to state that during the period of your service as mate on board the U. S. frigate Minnesota, (of which vessel I was the executive officer), your conduct as an officer and a gentleman was everything that could be desired in either. You were always prompt and precise in the discharge of your duties and perfectly correct in conduct and morals. Your bravery displayed in the various actions with Fort Fisher, both on shipboard and in the naval assault upon that fortress, your patience and fortitude while suffering from the severe wound you received in the assault, won the admiration of all who observed or knew of either. It was my pleasure to recommend you for promotion; and at the close of the war, when the volunteer branch of the service was largely reduced, to recommend you for retention in the service. You have my warmest wishes for your future welfare, and particularly for your success in your coming examination."

In March, 1872, Simms was promoted to second lieutenant, and in November, 1879, to first lieutenant, having to pass both physical and professional examinations.

In March, 1893, Lieutenant Simms was examined for promotion to the grade of captain, but failed to pass a satisfactory physical examination. He was kept on duty for one year, when he was detached and placed on "waiting orders."

April 24, 1895, after Congressional act approved March 2, 1895, relating to the examination of officers of the Revenue Service, providing for a "permanent waiting orders" list, Lieutenant Simms was examined, and on May 3, 1895, placed permanently off duty, the board having reported him permanently incapacitated.

In the spring of 1898 Lieutenant Simms tendered his service to the Navy and to the Revenue-Cutter Service in the war with Spain. He was informed by the Treasury Department that in the absence of the necessary legislation the Department could not order officers en the "permanent waiting orders" list to active duty.

The passage of the bill will provide for the advancement of Lieutenant Simms to a grade which he would have attained but for physical failure, which failure was due to his wounds and arduous service. It will give him an increase in pay amounting to $900 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. After the word "authorized," in line 4, I move to strike out the words "and directed." I do not think it is proper for us to direct the President to do so and so. If amended as I propose, the bill would read:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the words "and directed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Let that bill be read once more, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to advance Lieut. Joseph M. Simms, Revenue-Cutter Service, one grade, from first lieutenant to that of captain, on the "permanent waiting orders" list in the Revenue-Cutter Service, for meritorious acts of public service and wounds received in the United States service, as appears upon the public records of the volunteer service of the Army and Navy and of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Mr. HOAR. Of course I make no objection to a bill based on such satisfactory reasons as those; but I should like for information to ask the Senator from Missouri if the President has not in the Revenue-Cutter Service that power now without an act of Congress?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not now.

Mr. HOAR. Why not?

Mr. COCKRELL. Because this officer was found physically incapacitated for promotion, and the President can not promote an officer who is on what is called the "Waiting orders list."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT-LAND PAYMENTS.

The bill (S. 314) for the relief of persons who made the first payment for desert lands under the act of March 3, 1877, but who were unable to perfect entry thereof, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in any case where, before March 3, 1891, under an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1877, any person made the first payment into the local land office and filed a declaration of his intention to reclaim a tract of desert land pursuant to the provisions of that act, and where such person was unable from any cause, other than his own fraudulent or unlawful act, to make final entry of such land, or any part thereof, the Secretary of the Interior shall, upon proper application, cause to be repaid to the person making such payment, or to his heirs or assigns, all the money so paid as such first payment upon lands of which he was unable to make final entry as aforesaid. But an assignment of the desert-land claim, or an error on the part of the original claimant in filing upon land not subject to desert entry, shall not defeat such repayment; that application for repaymenl must be made within three years after the passage of this act, or the right thereto will be deemed abandoned; and that assignees shall be entitled to such repayment only where the assignment was made before December 6, 1899, etc.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. DODGE.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to call up——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I hope the Senator will let the next case on the Calendar come up.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Regular order, Mr. President.

The bill (H. R. 299) for the relief of William C. Dodge was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William C. Dodge, of Washington, D. C., $10,000 for a cartridge-loading machine furnished by him to the United States upon an order from the Ordnance Department, and for the use of his invention of the same, and of the patent therefor, dated July 17, 1866, and for his improvement in cartridges, patented July 4, 1865, and for the infringement of such patents by the United States; and provides that the $10,000 shall be in full satisfaction of all claims for such use and infringements and for the relinquishment of all right to claim any further compensation for the use of the same by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 3666) to authorize the sale of a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation in the State of Nebraska was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in line 11, to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand four hundred and forty;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the village of Valentine, Nebr., the northwest quarter of section 29, and the northeast quarter of section 30, and the east one-half of the southeast quarter of section 30, and the east half of section 31, all in township 34 north of range 27, west of the sixth principal meridian, Cherry County, State of Nebraska, now a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, for the sum of $1,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGREEMENT WITH SIOUX TRIBE.

The bill (S. 2992) to ratify an agreement with the Sioux tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Reservation in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I shall desire to discuss this bill at a greater length than is allowed under the rule. It is not a unanimous report of the Indian Affairs Committee. It involves the whole question of public policy about what we are going to do with these Indian reservations, and I shall desire to take some time in its discussion. I think the bill had better stand over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

LIEUT. ROBERT PLATT, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The bill (S. 3317) authorizing the President to appoint Lieut. Robert Platt, United States Navy, to the rank of commander, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in the case be read.

The SECRETARY read the report submitted by Mr. HANNA on the 7th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3317) authorizing the President to appoint Robert Platt, United States Navy, to the rank of commander, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following letter, written in response to a request of this committee for its views on a like bill in the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, which then passed the Senate, but failed in the House:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 24, 1900.

SIR: Referring to your communication of the 20th instant, inclosing a copy of the bill (S. 3077) authorizing the President to appoint Lieut. Robert Platt, U. S. N., to the rank of commander, and requesting the views of the Department in regard thereto, I have the honor to submit the following statement:

In consideration of long and faithful service in the Volunteer Navy, Mr. Platt was, by special act of Congress approved June 7, 1878, appointed an acting master, not in the line of promotion, and when, by virtue of the act of March 3, 1883, the grade of master was changed to that of lieutenant (junior grade), he became a lieutenant (junior grade), not in line of promotion.

The position occupied by Lieutenant Platt in the Navy is unique. On the 14th of March, 1897, he reached the age of 62 years, at which age he would, if of or above the rank of commander, have been placed on the retired list, but such action in the case of an officer of his rank is expressly prohibited by section 1445 of the Revised Statutes.

This officer would some years ago have attained the rank to which it is the purpose of the bill now to advance him, and would thereafter have received the pay of that grade, had it not been for the fact that he was not in the line of promotion, having been an acting officer only.

In consideration of the peculiar status occupied by Lieutenant Platt and the meritorious features which an examination of his entire record discloses, the Department views with favor the purpose of the bill above mentioned, which is understood to be to place this officer on the retired list as a commander. It is suggested, however, that while the bill in its present form, if enacted into law, would perhaps bring about such result, it would seem better to effect it by an express provision. This suggestion is made in view of the terms of section 11 of the "personnel act," which might be held to call for the retirement of the officer concerned with the rank of captain, instead of that of commander, which is understood to be the measure of reward in contemplation. It is recommended, therefore, that the latter clause of the bill be so amended as to directly authorize the retirement of Lieutenant Platt as a commander, and a draft embodying this suggestion is inclosed. With such modification, the bill is commended to the favorable consideration of the committee.

In this connection the attention of the committee is invited to H. R. Report No. 2806, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, and S. Report No. 380, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUIS WEBER.

The bill (H. R. 1375) for the relief of Louis Weber was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HANNA on the 11th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1375) for the relief of Louis Weber, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following letter of the Secretary of the Navy in the following House report:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1375) for the relief of Louis Weber, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

"This is a bill enacting that Louis Weber, of Fauquier Springs, Va., be declared entitled to the benefits of the acts of August 4 and 5, 1854, as to reenlistment pay during his last service, from August 25, 1864, to July 9, 1867, in the United States Marine Corps.

"The facts are substantially set forth in House Report No. 1820 of the third session, Fifty-fifth Congress, which is appended to and made a part of this report."

[House Report No. 1820, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs submit the following report on the bill (H. R. 8124) which asks that Louis Weber be declared entitled to the benefits of the acts of August 4 and 5, 1854, for reenlistment pay from August 25, 1864, to July 9, 1867, in the United States Marine Service.

Louis Weber enlisted as a musician in the United States Marine Corps at Washington on the 15th day of December, 1842, and served practically continuously until July 9, 1867—something over twenty-four years.

On October 5, 1862, claimant reenlisted under an advertised promise by the United States recruiting officers of a bounty for all who should reenlist at that time. It was afterwards held, however, by the proper accounting officer that there was no law for such a bounty, and claimant was therefore discharged under date of August 18, 1864, for the purpose of permitting him to reenlist in a legal manner.

Claimant went to New York and, under date of August 25, 1864, reenlisted as a substitute and was assigned for duty with the United States Marine Corps at Washington, and was regularly mustered out of the service under date of July 9, 1867.

The act above referred to, of August 4, 1854, section 1284 of the Revised Statutes, provided that every soldier who, having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States, shall within one month thereafter reenlist shall be entitled to $2 per month in addition to the ordinary pay of his grade for the first period of five years after the expiration of his previous enlistment, and a further sum of $1 per month for each successive period of five years so long as he shall remain continuously in the Army.

By act of August 5, 1854, section 1612, Revised Statutes, the benefits of the act of August 4, 1854, were extended to noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the United States.

Claimant has received no bounty from his State or Government, and claims the reenlistment pay from the date of last enlistment, August 25, 1864, to July 9, 1867, thirty-four and one-half months.

This bill was referred to the honorable Secretary of the Navy for his recommendation, and the reply is herein incorporated as a part of this report:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 7, 1898.

"SIR: Referring to the bill (H. R. 8124) for the relief of Louis Weber, and in response to the request of the committee for its views thereon, the Department has to state that the claim of Weber for the benefits of the acts of August 4 and 5, 1854, has been considered and adversely decided by the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury. (See Decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, vol. 3, p. 640, and numerous authorities cited therein.) It thus appears that in the opinion of this officer, which seems to have been carefully considered, Weber is not entitled, under existing law, to the benefits of said acts. It nevertheless remains true that if Weber had voluntarily reenlisted he would have been entitled to the benefits of the acts, and that the Comptroller's construction of the law debars him from these benefits because he entered the service as a substitute. It seems, therefore, to the Department that, Congress having the power to give him the benefit of the act, there is no reason why it should not do so.

"Very respectfully,

"JOHN D. LONG.

"CHARLES A. BOUTELLE,
"Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives."

It will thus be seen that the honorable Secretary of the Navy is of the opinion that the claimant should be allowed to receive the benefits of the reenlistment pay. In this opinion the committee concur. The claimant's long and honorable service—twenty-four and a half years in the Marine Corps—in the opinion of the committee, justly entitles him to the modest claim, which he prefers, for reenlistment pay for thirty-four and a half months, and they therefore report the bill favorably with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDALS FOR OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE KEARSARGE.

The bill (S. 3791) to provide suitable medals for the officers and crew of the United States vessel of war Kearsarge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the number and names of the officers and crew now surviving and the heirs of those deceased of the United States vessel of war Kearsarge who were on board said vessel at the time she engaged and sank the Confederate vessel of war Alabama, off Cherbourg, France, January 19, 1864; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to provide each of said officers and crew now surviving, and the heirs of those deceased, with a bronze medal, with proper superscription and design.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to see that such medals are properly distributed to said surviving officers and crew and the heirs of those deceased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Missouri asks for the reading of the report. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. HALE on the 11th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3791) to provide suitable medals for the officers and crew of the United States vessel of war Kearsarge, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the number and names of the officers and crew now surviving and the heirs of those deceased of the United States vessel of war Kearsarge who were on board said vessel at the time she engaged and sank the Confederate vessel of war Alabama, off Cherbourg, France, January 19, 1864; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to provide each of said officers and crew now surviving, and the heirs of those deceased, with a bronze medal, with proper superscription and design.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to see that such medals are properly distributed to said surviving officers and crew and the heirs of those deceased."

The bill as amended has the approval of the Navy Department, as will appear by the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 27, 1902.

SIR: Referring to the bill (S. 3791) to provide suitable medals for the officers and crew of the United States vessel of war Kearsarge, I have the honor to state that the Department has no objection to urge to the passage of the measure, it appearing to be appropriate to recognize in the manner proposed an important historical event such as the destruction of the Alabama. It is observed that, as worded, the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Navy "to appropriate out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," * * * which is, however, doubtless an oversight on the part of those that drafted the measure, and, although authorizing in the first section medals to the heirs of those deceased who participated in the engagement, directs that only the names of the survivors shall be ascertained by the Department.

I transmit herewith a draft of a measure in amendment for the convenience of the committee if it deems advisable to change the bill in the particulars herein mentioned, and commend the same to its favorable consideration.

Very respectfully,

JNO. D. LONG, Secretary.

WASHINGTON STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1912) granting to the State of Washington 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Washington State Soldiers and Sailors' Home.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, one of the reasons I have heard given most frequently why this bill should be passed is that it is not altogether so bad as a bill which was pending during the last Congress, which failed to pass. This is somewhat faint praise, I think, for a bill, and faint praise is said to be at times more damaging than direct criticism.

Mr. President, I state that in my judgment this bill is better than that bill in one particular, and one only; that in many other ways it is a worse bill, and that in every way except in one it is equally bad with the bill which failed in the last Congress. It is better in the fact that for the first five years it will not cost as much money as the bill to which I have alluded.

It is worse in the fact that, if it accomplishes the purpose which its friends hope, in coming years it will cost many million dollars more than the other bill. It is worse in the fact that there is no limitation in this bill as to the amount which may be expended in any one year, while the other bill was limited to $9,000,000 a year. It is worse in the fact that there is no limitation whatever as to the time when these appropriations shall continue, while the other bill limited it to a period of twenty years. It is worse in the fact that the other bill required that these ships which receive the benefit should carry freight equal to 50 per cent of their cargo capacity.

This bill does not require them to carry any freight whatever. It is worse than the other bill, in the fact that this bill does not compel a single beneficiary of it to build a single ship in the United States at the United States shipyards, while there was a requirement in the other bill which insured the building of some ships. It is equally bad with the other bill in the fact that it gives preference to the fast liners, those which do not carry freight, and especially it gives a special benefit to the International Navigation Company, and in that particular I want say that the bill is worse than the former measure, because it seeks to cover up, under the name of pay for carrying the mails, the idea of a direct and specific subsidy to these fast-line steamers. It is equally bad with the other bill in violating that principle of equality upon which the States were united into the Union and upon which the Republic was founded. It is equally bad, in my judgment, in being contrary to the fundamental law of the land and unconstitutional.

I am going to dare to say a few words about the Constitution, Mr. President, although the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] yesterday sneered at the Democratic conscience and ridiculed the idea that any Senator could be moved or actuated by his belief in the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a measure. Notwithstanding his sneers and his ridicule I hope there are many thousands of people in this Republic, Democrats and Republicans, who still believe that the oath we take to defend and abide by and support the Constitution of the United States is binding upon the conscience of the man who takes it. I then say that if a bill is obnoxious to the Constitution it ought not to pass the Senate.

I am fully aware, Mr. President, that there is a modern school composed, I fear, of a great many who believe that this Government has outgrown the Constitution, who believe that we should no longer be hampered by it, and the result is that we find new rules of construction. The result is that we find men seeking every pretext that they can find in order to avoid that written instrument which we all swear to obey. On the 27th of last month in the House of Representatives I heard the distinguished Secretary of State, in delivering a memorial address, lay down this proposition. In speaking of President McKinley he said that—

> He believed in a strong, aggressive nationality; in a liberal construction of the Constitution. What any self-reliant nation might rightly do, he felt this nation had power to do, if required by the common welfare and not prohibited by our written charter.

Mr. President, in the olden times I think that every court in the United States, every State and Federal court, including the Supreme Court of the United States, have said again and again that the Government of the United States is one of limited powers and these powers were defined by the Constitution, and beyond that we could not go. One of the first things that every lawyer has to learn is the difference between what a legislature of a State might do and what the Congress of the United States could do. It was taught in many of the schools of the country that a State legislature could do any act that was not prohibited by the Constitution of the United States or the constitution of the State; that the Congress of the United States could do no act unless it was authorized by the Constitution of the United States; and the most liberal constructionists never went beyond the idea that you could only do what the Constitution authorized or such necessary acts as to carry into effect those provisions which were authorized.

I say that was the former construction. All of the courts of the country said that was the law. Yet we find the Secretary of State laying down a new rule and asserting that Congress can do anything unless it be prohibited by the Constitution, although the Constitution says in specific and direct words "all powers not granted are reserved to the States or to the people thereof."

I therefore repeat that the modern idea to construe away the written instrument and leave the Congress of the United States free to do any act that the majority of its members may think will promote the general welfare is contrary to all the rulings and the belief that existed in the days of the past. It is contrary to the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States made again and again. As to what a majority of the present court might rule I confess I am utterly unable to say, but such has been the ruling in the past.

If that rule be applied to this bill, then, Mr. President, the bill can not stand. If I stood alone upon this, I might hesitate to state my opinion, but I want to read a short extract from a letter written by ex-Senator Edmunds, of Vermont. Bear in mind that at the time he wrote it he was the employed counsel of the International Navigation Company. He was seeking, as the attorney for that company, to have that bill passed through the Congress of the United States. It had been asserted by men upon this floor, and especially by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that if that was constitutional, then it would be constitutional to grant a bounty to the wheat raisers and corn raisers of the West and the cotton raisers of the South.

Ex-Senator Edmunds, in order to show that a proposition which granted such a bounty to the farmers would be unconstitutional, laid down the following proposition, and I assert that no definition has ever been given in such a concise and direct way that more completely expresses the true idea of the Constitution than these words used by ex-Senator Edmunds. In a letter directed to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, something more than a year ago, he said:

> The Constitution of the United States as it now stands is designed to prevent Congress as well as the States from enacting any class legislation whatever. Equal rights and equal opportunities to engage in any business or enterprise, and to receive equal or corresponding benefits from public expenditures, are among the fundamental principles embodied in that instrument.

It is true that in the same letter the ex-Senator from Vermont sought to show that this bounty to these ships was an exception to the rule which he had so admirably laid down, and he contended that because these ships might be used in time of war, therefore Congress could grant this ship subsidy.

Mr. President, it seems to me that Mr. Edmunds would never have made that argument upon the floor of the Senate. He had voted against the subsidy bill here while he was a Senator. Now he put it upon the narrow and untenable ground, and that only, that they might be used in time of war to aid the Navy of the United States. But, Mr. President, does it not occur to any man that because they may be useful in time of war the same rule would apply to the farmers throughout the land that applies to the shipowners? If these ships can be used in time of war, I ask if wheat and corn, the two great food products of the world, without which armies can not be marched and maintained, can not and must be used in time of war?

Mr. President, if it is constitutional to give a subsidy to those ships because they may be used in time of war, I would ask some Senator upon the other side of the Chamber to say why it is not equally constitutional to give a bounty or a subsidy to the raisers of horses and mules throughout the country. No war can be carried on without either. They are not only most useful, but an absolute necessity in war. Then, how can any lawyer say that because one is used in war it is constitutional to subsidize it and unconstitutional to subsidize the other?

To carry the illustration further, no army can be raised or maintained without cotton and wool to clothe them, and the same reasoning would carry the idea that a bounty or a subsidy might be given to the cotton raisers of the South and the wool raisers of the West. No, Mr. President; Mr. Edmunds, ex-Senator from Vermont, confidently laid down the constitutional proposition, and then sought, like many a lawyer before him, to bring the particular case with which he was employed at that time within an exception, but the exception did not apply.

I shall not now go further in regard to this; but I assert again that in the earlier days of the Republic this bill would not have stood the test of the courts. I say that in the earlier days of the Republic its injustice, its inequality, the character of class legislation embodied in the bill, would have damned it forever in the estimation of a great majority of the American people. It is only recently, when the great combinations of wealth have united to increase that wealth, that every means is sought to get around the fundamental law of the land whenever a bill pending will benefit that class, and yet when it is sought to pass an antitrust law or an income-tax law the majority of the Supreme Court stand ready to say that such laws are unconstitutional.

Before I proceed to argue as to the different clauses of this bill, I want the Senate of the United States and I want the people of the United States to know who are going to be the beneficiaries of the bill. I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] yesterday referred to something I had said in regard to the farmers in a speech made during the last Congress. I want the farmers of the great Northwest, of the wheat-growing regions, and the farmers throughout the Southern country who grow cotton, and I want the people who labor on those farms, and those who labor in the shops throughout this great Republic of ours to know who is to get the money which the majority of their Representatives are going to take out of the Treasury and give to certain individuals. Therefore I ask that the Secretary read from the article which I send to the desk the part I have marked. Then we shall begin to understand what is behind this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Without objection, the article referred to will be read.

The Secretary read from the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of New York, of Tuesday, March 11, 1902, as follows:

IMPORTANT PROGRESS IN THE STEAMSHIP DEAL—WHITE STAR LINE BOUGHT BY MORGAN SYNDICATE—TERRITORIAL ARRANGEMENT CONCLUDED BETWEEN BRITISH AND GERMAN LINES—ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE DEAL AWAITING THE PASSAGE OF THE SUBSIDY BILL—OBJECT OF THE STEAMSHIP MEN'S VISIT.

It was learned last evening from what is considered an authoritative source that arrangements have been tentatively made—if, indeed, the matter has not already taken definite and final shape—whereby the White Star Line will pass under the management and control of the Morgan steamship syndicate. With the acquisition of this line the syndicate are now credited with controlling the following companies:

The White Star Line, with its world-wide connections.
The American Line to Southampton.
The Red Star Line to Antwerp.
The Leyland Line to Liverpool.
The Atlantic Transport to London.
The Dominion Line to Liverpool and London and the Mediterranean from Boston.

It is understood that the decision to take over the White Star Line was virtually concluded at the dinner given by Mr. Widener at Philadelphia on February 5. This dinner, it will be recalled, was announced to be merely an incidental in a trip of pleasure by Mr. Morgan to see Mr. Widener's art collection, and that Mr. Widener had invited a few friends to dine with Mr. Morgan. It may be stated definitely, however, that matters of weighty importance aside from the White Star deal were discussed at that gathering.

Among those present at the dinner who may be said to have an interest in the steamship deal were Clement A. Griscom, president of the International Navigation Company; A. J. Cassatt, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad; Bernard M. Baker, president of the Atlantic Transport Line; H. H. Rogers, representing Standard Oil Company interests, and Henry Wilding, of Richardson, Spence & Co., English agents of the American Line. Mr. Wilding is also chairman of the Leyland Line. In addition Messrs. Widener and Elkins, of the Widener-Elkins syndicate, who are commonly credited with being interested in the big steamship syndicate, were at the banquet. It will be seen that a very representative list of steamship men were on hand, and it is also significant that the dinner was held the same day that Mr. J. Bruce Ismay, manager of the White Star Line, sailed on the Oceanic for home, evidently after leaving his final proposition to be acted on. It will be recalled that the Right Hon. William James Perrie, a director in both the Leyland and White Star lines, accompanied Mr. Ismay to this country and returned with him.

No meeting of the shareholders of the White Star Line has yet been held to ratify the proposed scale, though no doubt is entertained by those familiar with the situation that Mr. Ismay would not have allowed matters to progress as far as they have unless he had the consent of a sufficient majority of the stock to make his own action binding.

As to the terms of the new deal, there is no definite information. It may be taken for granted, however, that the transaction will to a considerable extent be a cash one, and will not involve a very large transfer of securities of Mr. Morgan's new company in payment of the White Star property. The White Star Line is one of the closest of close corporations. It is not a public company in any sense, and shareholders desiring to sell must, under the by-laws, first offer their shares to their fellow-stockholders at a price definitely established. The capital stock is only £750,000, which is less than the value of one of the steamers, the Oceanic, and the stockholders have been receiving yearly dividends of 10 per cent on the capital stock. It is quite evident, therefore, that any agreement that has been made with the Morgan syndicate must have been on a very satisfactory basis to the stockholders, since they have been asked to sell and have not been the ones seeking a buyer.

WAITING THE SHIP-SUBSIDY BILL.

It is understood that in the fall or early in the new year it is the intention of the Morgan syndicate to organize a company which shall take over the various lines and that the stock of this company will be offered to investors. It is not expected, however, that any immediate official announcement of either the purchase of the White Star Line or the proposed new company will be made, at any rate at the present stage of the ship-subsidy bill. It is pointed out by interests friendly to the new company that under its present form the subsidy bill provides for vessels owned in the United States in contradistinction from American-built vessels, and it may be possible to admit a very considerable part of the tonnage Mr. Morgan's syndicate has purchased to American registry, so that this tonnage may participate in the Government's distributions. Such a condition would naturally furnish a very substantial impulse when the stock is offered for public subscription. As a matter of fact, steamship interests which are particularly well informed on the progress of affairs in Washington are looking for changes in the present ship-subsidy bill which will further benefit the syndicate lines before the final enactment of the bill.

Mr. BERRY. That is not all of the article, but sufficient for my purpose.

Mr. President, we now begin to see what many have long believed, that it is the intention and the purpose to form a syndicate which will control the entire foreign shipments on American vessels; not only that, but Mr. Morgan, united with those who have purchased the Leyland Line, has now purchased the White Star Line and has united with the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and also, as the article states, he has purchased what is known as the International Navigation Company's Line, of which Mr. Griscom is the president.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. I should like to ask the Senator whether he states upon his own knowledge that Mr. Morgan has purchased the White Star Line and has purchased the other lines to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. BERRY. I have made the statement upon knowledge received from the article which has just been read. I have no other knowledge. It was published in the New York Journal of Commerce, which is not a political paper in any sense of the word, but is universally regarded as a reliable paper on commercial matters.

Mr. HANNA. If the Senator bases his statement upon a newspaper article——

Mr. BERRY. I have based it upon that. Does the Senator say that it is not true?

Mr. HANNA. I do not know anything about it, any more than does the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator from Ohio has no means of knowing whether it is true or not, I certainly have not.

Mr. HANNA. But the Senator does not believe all the articles that are published in the newspapers.

Mr. BERRY. No, I do not; but I believe Mr. Morgan bought the Leyland Line, and I believe that he and Mr. Griscom are uniting to form a syndicate to control the entire shipments that are made in American-built ships or American-registered vessels. I believe that, Mr. President. I have no shadow of doubt but what they and those united with them are the parties who will be the beneficiaries under this bill if it becomes a law.

Mr. HANNA. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. Does the Senator contend that under this bill a single vessel now a foreign vessel could receive any benefit?

Mr. BERRY. Not unless it was admitted to American registry.

Mr. HANNA. How could it be admitted to American registry?

Mr. BERRY. It could be admitted to American registry by an act of Congress.

Mr. HANNA. Under certain conditions.

Mr. BERRY. Under the conditions that Congress sees fit to impose.

Mr. HANNA. Is there any precedent for any such admission, except in the case of the New York and the Paris?

Mr. BERRY. Those are the most notable cases, but a number of vessels have been admitted to American registry, some during the present Congress, and one was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce this morning.

Mr. HANNA. That was a special case, was it not?

Mr. BERRY. That was a vessel wrecked in Cuban waters and not coming within the law; but the Committee on Commerce reported it, and the committee also reported in favor of granting an American registry to a vessel plying on Puget Sound, which passed during the last Congress. Numerous vessels have been admitted to American registry.

The article which has been read states, and it is true, that this bill in its subsidy clause refers to vessels owned by American capital and admitted to the registry. It does not require that those vessels shall be built at the shipyards of the United States, but it says under the second head, which I am talking about and not of the mail pay, that if the vessels be owned by American citizens and be admitted to American registry, then the owners of those vessels are the beneficiaries under this bill.

I admit, Mr. President, that foreign-built vessels can not be admitted to American registry without an act of Congress, but they can be so admitted with an act of Congress. If it be true that Mr. Morgan and those gentlemen I have named, who have the controlling interest in these lines, want vessels admitted to American registry, I have no doubt that they will be able to convince a majority of the Congress of the United States that those vessels ought to be so admitted.

I have had this article read because it proves what has been charged and believed by a great many people heretofore, that this is simply an effort to take money out of the Treasury to aid those men who are united and combined, and who represent the very greatest wealth in the United States—the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the president of the International Navigation Company, and Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who, I think, is regarded as one of the wealthiest men in the United States, if not in the world.

There was united with them heretofore—I do not know whether such is the case now or not—the Huntington interest and the Southern Pacific Railroad. All those men are combined and united, as I believe—men who are already immensely wealthy—to increase that wealth by taking money which belongs to all the people of the United States. That is the bill, and that is what you are called upon to vote for.

Mr. President, before I take up the specific provision relating to the mail subsidy there is one matter I desire to refer to, a statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Maine, the presiding officer of this body. I am sorry that he is sick to-day and unable to be here. I wanted to ask him some questions in regard to this bill, but later on I may put some of them perhaps to the Senator from Ohio.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to a most remarkable admission made by the Senator from Maine in his opening speech. He said that he did not think he could be accused of selfishness when he said that the only way by which our carrying trade could be restored was to take from the Treasury of the United States a sufficient sum of money to make up for the difference in the cost of the construction and operation of American ships as compared with foreign ships. He did not stop there, Mr. President. He said, "You have been doing that for years; you are doing it to-day for every protected interest throughout the United States;" that is, you are taking money out of the Treasury and paying it to every protected interest in the United States. I think, coming from so distinguished a protectionist as the Senator from Maine, a leader in the cause, that that is a remarkable admission.

In 1896 on every stump, on every rostrum, and at almost every schoolhouse throughout the land, the Republican speakers said that the foreigner paid the tax, that it did not come out of the people of the United States, and the late distinguished President of the United States, in a speech made in Ohio, is reported to have said that this protective tariff is paid by the foreigner; and yet we now have the Senator from Maine declaring that it is paid out of the Treasury of the United States to every one of these protected industries.

I do not agree with the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Maine that it comes out of the Treasury. It is taken, Mr. President, from the consumers, from the men who buy the manufactured products; it is taken from their pockets and transferred to the pockets of the manufacturers of the United States.

Now, after having done that, and after these men have grown enormously rich, the Senator from Maine proposes to go one step further. He wants to take that money, which came into the Treasury by reason of the laws which enabled these manufacturers to take it from the consumers throughout the land, and give that also to these protected interests.

It is a beautiful system you have established by means of these laws. In the first place, you enable the manufacturers to take this money out of the consumers, and then in the process you put money into the Treasury which belongs to all the people, and now this bill proposes to take that and divide it also. I was astonished when the Senator from Maine stood here and admitted that every dollar of this money was taken out of the Treasury of the United States and went to the protected manufacturers throughout the country.

Having said this much, I want to give a few reasons why I believe this bill in many particulars—not in all particulars—is worse than the bill which was defeated in the last Congress. Under the act of 1891, the postal subsidy law, we paid for carrying the mails of the United States $1,826,026, and out of this sum we paid to foreign steamers $575,665. That is the act of 1891. I do not want the people of the country to misunderstand this fact. It is heavy pay for carrying the mails.

I want to say that, even under the present law, the money is not all used for the purpose of carrying the mails. I want to say that more than one-half of it now, under the act of 1891, is a direct subsidy to the ships of this country, and in order to prove that and show it beyond the shadow of a doubt I simply want to state a fact which proves it, and which no man can deny. We paid the International Navigation Company for carrying the mails—that is the American company, that is Griscom's company, that is the one which J. Pierpont Morgan is said to have bought in the article which has been read—we paid them last year $528,526 for carrying the United States mails. We paid the Cunard Line, an English line of steamers, $213,103. Now, bear in mind the first amount is $528,526 paid to the American line, and $213,103 to the English line, and yet the English company carried almost double the amount of mail that was carried by the American company. Therefore I say that it is not true and it is misleading to say that this money is paid for carrying the mail. A portion of it is paid for that purpose, but the greater part of it is a direct subsidy to the American company.

Mr. President, with every other citizen of the United States I should be glad to see our mails carried in American vessels; with every other citizen of the United States I should be glad to see our farm products, which are shipped abroad, go in American-built and American-registered vessels; but, as a business proposition, when you come to contract for carrying the mails, the Government ought to make that contract as any business man would contract in the transaction of his business—that is, by securing the service desired for the least possible amount of money. I state to-day that however patriotic a man may be—you can take the shipowners and the owners of these shipyards in the United States themselves—if an English line of steamers will carry their freight cheaper than an American line they will patronize the English line at all times. It is human nature; it is part of the business instinct of a man to secure the lowest price possible for the work that is to be done. Therefore I assert that it is not just and fair to say that this money now paid under the act of 1891 is paid for carrying the mails. Part of it is paid for that purpose, and the remainder is a subsidy.

Now, let us see what this bill will do with them. We paid $1,826,026. Under this bill the committee say, and the chairman of the committee stated on this floor, that if a semiweekly mail was established from New York to Southampton, as he hoped and believed would be done if this bill became a law, the amount paid to the International Navigation Company, instead of being $575,000, would be $1,713,000; and yet we are told that this bill is not so bad as the bill which was under consideration at the last session. The other bill was bad because it gave to the International Navigation Company so many advantages, and yet this bill, which we are now considering, instead of giving that company $575,000 would give them $1,713,000. Yet Senators tell us that this bill is not bad; that it is a great deal better than the other bill.

Here is a question which I desire to put to the Senator from Ohio in the absence of the Senator from Maine. In answer to my inquiry the other day, whether, if this bill passed and the Postmaster-General saw proper to contract with the International Navigation Company for a semiweekly service, the expenditures for subsidy under this bill would not begin at once, the Senator from Maine said they would not, for the reason that the company only owned four ships, and it would take them one or two or three years—I do not know how long—to build other ships. Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio why in this bill there was stricken out that provision, which was in the act of 1891, which required the company with which the Postmaster-General should contract to carry the mails to Great Britain to carry such mails in ships of at least 8,000 tons, with a speed of not less than 20 knots an hour? That provision is not contained in this bill, and there is no limit as to the speed of the vessel that shall carry such mails. Under the act of 1891 the Postmaster-General can not contract with any company for the transportation of mails to Great Britain in vessels of a less speed than 20 knots an hour; but under this bill he can contract without regard to the speed.

It is stated and admitted that this same International Navigation Company has now two ships being constructed and almost ready to be launched from the Cramp shipyards in Philadelphia. They have two ships of 17 knots speed and 12,500 tons burden. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio, the inhibition or prohibition in regard to the speed of vessels being removed, why the International Navigation Company could not put these two ships, and other ships which they can secure, in service and get this additional subsidy at once? If he knows why the provision in regard to speed was taken out of this bill, I should be glad to have him tell us.

Mr. President, I do not say there was any particular reason, but when I remember how the International Company has been petted, when I remember how its president, Mr. Griscom, from day to day and week to week, stayed in these lobbies, around the Marble Room, and in the committee rooms, I say it looks strange to me, when it is known that he is building additional ships with a speed of only 17 knots an hour, that the provision in the act of 1891 requiring mail to Great Britain to be carried in a ship of not less than 20 knots is stricken out and there is no longer any limitation upon the speed of the vessel. I state that to be a fact, and if the Senator will examine the bill he will see it.

While I think of it, in connection with Mr. Griscom, I wish to state here that some three years ago when he was before the Committee on Commerce, when he had testified that it was impossible to run ships in competition with the English and the German ships; that by reason of the greater wages paid on American ships he could not do it; that it would not pay to do it; that it was necessary to make up the difference, I put the question to him: "Mr. Griscom, you ran those ships last year; did you make or lose money?" He hesitated and said: "That has nothing to do with it." Senator Edmunds said to him: "I think you had better answer the Senator's question;" and he did answer it. He said: "We did make money." Yet we are told that the steamship companies are losing money. We are told that it is a question of wages, and that unless the United States steps in and pays the difference the American ships can not compete.

It is admitted that under this clause the mail pay will be increased to the amount of $4,700,000, I believe, and yet the $1,800,000 now is more than double what is required to pay really for the carrying of the mail. If it were let to the lowest bidder, including foreign lines, I say it could be had for less than one-half. But the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] would wave the flag in this Chamber, and in an enthusiastic, high, lofty, and patriotic manner would say "Oh, it would never do; we must see the American flag in every port throughout the world."

This reminds me that the Senator from New York in his speech here a year ago stated that if that bill became a law, within a few years we would equal and pass Germany in the carrying trade and in a few years longer we would overtake Great Britain. But he said nothing less than that proposed law would accomplish the purpose. He said it must be that; that it was scientifically arranged. I do not undertake to quote his exact language, but this is his idea: "This bill and nothing else will do it." Yet that bill authorized the expenditure of $9,000,000 a year. The Senator from New York said yesterday, "If you pass this bill, within five years the American carrying trade will surpass that of Germany and will soon equal that of Great Britain." "Yet," he said, "this bill, even at the end of five years, can not cost more than $6,000,000 a year." I should like to ask him and other Senators who are supporting this bill, and who say it will accomplish the purpose, what they wanted to do with the other $3,000,000 that was in the bill last year? If $6,000,000 per annum is enough to enable us to pass Germany and equal Great Britain, why did you from week to week press a bill for $9,000,000 a year, continuing for twenty years?

I wish to ask now, and that is what I wanted to ask the Senator from Maine, why did you have in the bill $9,000,000 when you say that $6,000,000 will accomplish the purpose, and the Senator says it will accomplish it within five years? The Democrats, then, according to the statement of the Senator from New York, if they did not do anything else at the last session but defeat that bill, now have the admission that we defeated a bill which provided for the expenditure of $9,000,000 a year for twenty years, when they now say that a measure providing for $6,000,000 at the end of five years will accomplish all that the other would. I think, then, we are entitled to some credit at least for saving that sum, if no more.

One more word in regard to the postal subsidy. It is not so much with me a matter of the dollars and cents involved in it as it is that it seeks to cover up and mislead the people of the United States. You seek to make them believe that it is necessary in order to carry their mails, when you know that that is not the purpose of a great part of it; that the purpose is to give it to the owners of these ships, and that is the main purpose. Then, if you are going to give this subsidy, I think it would be more honest to have provided for the carrying of the mail and boldly said, "We are going to take this money out of the Treasury and give it to those beneficiaries."

I will pass from the mail part of it. I am not going at length into these figures. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] early in the session, and later the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], presented figures in such a way as to show that each of them has an accurate and thorough knowledge of the question. They showed beyond the shadow of a doubt that this appropriation is unnecessary. They showed that the shipbuilding industry in the United States was being revived. They showed that more ships were built last year in America than were built in any year for the last fifty years. They showed all this by the figures which they presented, and I shall not repeat them.

The Senator from Maine said that if we hoped to find in foreign countries a market for our products we could only get that market by carrying our products in American vessels and having American officers in command of the ships which carry them. He said that the mail had to precede the trade, and unless we had it in our own ships we never could find a market. Yet the Senator said in the same speech:

> The year before Mr. McKinley became President of the United States our exports amounted to $882,000,000. Last year they amounted to $1,487,000,000, nearly double. The year before Mr. McKinley became President of the United States our exports of manufactured products amounted to $228,000,000. Last year they amounted to $412,000,000, nearly double.

And yet he says we can get no foreign markets unless we have American-built ships with American captains, and he said we never had so few as last year; and yet in the face of that statement he says our exports have grown from $882,000,000 to $1,487,000,000, and our exports of manufactured products from $228,000,000 to $412,000,000. It seems to me we have been doing fairly well without these American captains. It seems to me that meets the argument of the Senator from Maine, that it is necessary in order to secure this trade that our products should be carried in American bottoms.

I pass to the other proposition in regard to the subsidy direct. It provides 1 cent a mile for all ships, both ways, outgoing and incoming. It is not required that these ships shall carry one pound of freight. The avowed object and purpose of this bill is that American freight and American goods shall be carried in American ships. Yet here is a cent a mile, going and coming, for 16 trips a year, and the ship which receives it is not required to carry one single pound of freight. The other bill of last year, which was said to be worse than this, required that ships should carry 50 per cent of their cargo capacity. But here is this bill giving this money to these ships when they can go out in ballast and not carry one pound of freight either one way or the other. Then there are the old ships to which the Senator from Iowa referred, some of which are on their last trip. They are to be paid this money and carry no freight. What kind of a bill is this? Do you think the Government of the United States should take this money and pay it to these men for their ships in this way?

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was anxious to know from the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] whether one of these ships could go to Manila and there unload part of its freight and go to Nagasaki. It is not necessary under this bill to unload any freight at Manila. The ship does not have to carry any freight to Manila under the bill in order to get the subsidy provided. It could go from Manila to Nagasaki and back around any route it saw proper and still get the subsidy and carry no freight. That is one way in which the bill is worse than the bill of last year.

The bill of last year provided that not more than $9,000,000 a year should be expended under it. There is no limit upon the amount which may be expended under this bill. It may be $5,000,000. It may be $9,000,000. It may be $15,000,000. Whatever it is the Government under this bill is bound to pay it. There is no limit on the amount to be paid every year; nor is there a limit as to how long the subsidy shall be paid.

It is true, as the Senator from Maine says, that the act could be repealed by Congress; but does any man believe that if this subsidy is once begun to these parties, if they are able now to secure the passage of a law which subsidizes the ships that carry no freight, which subsidizes these fast lines and pays them three times more than the cost of carrying the mail—does any man believe we will ever be able to repeal such a law?

No, the Senator from Maine will come again as he comes now. He said the bill of 1891 would have succeeded, but it did not give enough. He now comes and asks that we give more. If this bill becomes a law and fails to accomplish its purpose, he will say "the only difficulty is you did not give quite enough," and instead of repealing the law we will be asked to increase the amount.

Mr. President, in the argument of the Senator from Maine, made a year ago, he dwelt at length upon the proposition that we ought to pay a subsidy because the English and German and French nations were paying it, and it was in order, he said, to equalize ourselves with what they paid. In the argument he has made this year he has almost, if not quite, abandoned that proposition, and he bases it solely, as he said, upon the question of wages.

He has abandoned the idea that it is necessary for us to give a subsidy because Great Britain gives it, because the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] showed in his speech the other day that the tramp ships of England, which are seen in every port in the world, are the ships which carry the products of the world. They are the ships in which 53 per cent of the foreign commerce is carried, and these English ships which do the carrying trade receive not one dollar by way of subsidy from Great Britain. I say, then, the Senator from Maine has practically abandoned the argument that it is necessary for us to give a subsidy because other nations give it.

He also a year ago laid great stress on the fact that in the building of ships we could not compete on account of the increased cost of labor. While he argued that here the other day, but not at length as he did a year ago, he based his principal argument upon the wages paid on board ship. Now, on the first question, as to whether or not we can compete with foreign shipbuilders, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] placed in the RECORD the other day a statement from the Blue Book of American Shipping showing the number of ships that were constructed, giving the names of the shipyards, where constructed, stating the exact place, the tonnage, and to whom they belonged, and showed by that book that more ships were being built this year than had been built at any time within the last fifty years.

Not only that, but I have a statement here from Mr. Hyde, who is president of the Bath Iron Works, I believe. He says:

The output of the American shipyards for the present fiscal year will be larger than any year for nearly half a century.

Forty-five years ago the American shipyards were building nearly as many merchant vessels and of a tonnage almost as great as that of Great Britain. During the four years preceding the civil war the product of the American shipyards represented a greater carrying capacity in tons than that of the rival shipyards of England. There is no good reason why the American shipyards should not now construct a greater tonnage that Great Britain.

American shipyards are already constructing ships for European and Asiatic nations, and there is no good reason why a large amount of the shipbuilding trade from the Clyde and the Thames should not be brought to the yards of this consolidated company, which will possess such enormous advantages over any other company in the world.

There is a statement from him that there never has been a time when the shipbuilding interest was so prosperous as it is. Not only that testimony, but the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Missouri referred to other testimony and statements from various shipbuilders and established the fact that Mr. Hill was building ships and established a new shipyard for that purpose. The entire testimony shows that our shipbuilders can compete with those of Great Britain and Germany.

I would be glad if the Senator from Maine or anyone who favors this bill would tell me why it is not true. It is admitted that we compete with them in the building of railroad engines, railroad cars, farm implements of every character and description. We are shipping this year railroad engines and cars and farming implements to many of the ports of the world. If we can compete with those countries in building engines and cars and farming implements, why can not we compete with them in the building of ships? The men who manufacture the cars and engines and farming implements pay the tariff duties imposed by the United States. The owners of shipyards can import all of their raw material free of any charge. They have that advantage of the other manufacturers, and if these others can manufacture their goods and sell them in competition with the whole world, why can not the shipbuilders, with the advantage of free raw material, do the same?

Not only that, but the shipbuilders have the monopoly of the building of vessels for the entire coasting trade of the United States. It seems to me, with this protection, for them to say that it is impossible for them to build ships is not justified by the facts.

In addition to that, we have the evidence that Mr. Cramp's company underbid every shipbuilder throughout the world in building ships for the Russian and Italian, I believe, and the German navies—at least for the Russian, and I think for one of the other governments. If they could compete with them and be the lowest bidder and build those vessels, why can not they compete with the balance of the world without asking the Government to help them?

Mr. President, many of these great shipbuilders are known to be prosperous and rich, and it is unjust and unfair in a Government which claims to protect all of its citizens alike to ask it to levy a tribute upon the balance of the people of this country in order to put it into their own pockets. The statement that on account of the wages paid they can not compete is not true. The Senator from Georgia showed that the output of labor here is double what it is in Germany and England, and therefore the wages paid in proportion to the work produced are not any greater here than in those countries. That is proved by the statement filed by him and contained in his speech. If we pay double wages and the wage workers produce double the amount of work, then we do not pay any greater wages than in other countries.

Mr. President, the statement that we can not compete is shown in this debate to be without foundation in fact. All the proof shows that there is a revival of the shipping interest throughout this country. All the proof shows that the time has come when our shipbuilders can compete with other nations, and that the shipbuilding industry is going to be as prosperous as any other.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] the other day asked why it was that the ships had not been built. He might have asked why it was in times past that we did not ship any or but little of our manufactured products abroad.

The same cause that has enabled us to compete with foreign nations in manufactured articles is operating to revive the shipping and the shipbuilding industry of this country, and if you will let it alone and not contribute money out of the Treasury of the United States to build up a syndicate which will have the absolute monopoly of building ships, then that interest will be revived and come to stay. If you enable a few men with the immense wealth of Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Mr. Cassatt, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Mr. Griscom, of the International Steamship Company, to aid themselves out of the Treasury to form a combination which will control the shipping business, then it will not be revived. But if left to itself, to fair competition, it will take its pace with other manufacturing interests, and the time is not distant when we will have American ships built in American shipyards.

But, Mr. President, the last resort of the Senator from Maine, and that which he says makes it absolutely necessary to pass the bill, is that the wages paid on shipboard to the sailors and to the crew is so much higher on American ships than it is on foreign ships that therefore they can not operate an American ship in competition with those of other nations. The Senator from Maine furnished what he called the pay roll of an American ship and an English ship. He gave the salaries paid the officers and the sailors, except, I believe, that the master or the captain was not included. He showed by that that we paid for wages about one-third more than the wages paid on the English ship, and about one-half more than the wages paid on a German ship.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] also filed a list of wages on an English ship and an American ship, giving the wages of each one, as the Senator from Maine had done in his case, by which he showed that the wages paid on an American ship and an English ship are almost identical.

Now, where they got these lists I do not know. In all human probability they were both furnished by the Commissioner of Navigation. The Commissioner of Navigation in 1894 produced figures and facts that showed it was impossible to revive the shipbuilding interest in the United States except by free ships. He said there was no other way than by the repeal of the navigation laws. That was while he was Commissioner under a Democratic President. He remained Commissioner under a Republican administration, and one year ago he showed that the only possible way to revive shipping was by granting subsidies to American ships, and figured out that nothing less than $9,000,000 a year would accomplish that purpose under any circumstances. That bill failed, and that Commissioner now comes forward with facts ready to meet every emergency and shows beyond the shadow of a doubt that under a bill which he says will not cost more than $6,000,000 for five or six years, there is not a doubt in the world that shipbuilding will be revived and that American ships will sail under the American flag.

I say it is not impossible that a Commissioner of Navigation who can furnish facts and figures of that character could furnish the Senator from Georgia with a pay roll which showed that the pay was equal, and the Senator from Maine one which showed that we paid one-third more.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing. It has been asserted on this floor again and again that you could not hire seamen to work upon American vessels as cheaply as you can hire them to work on Norwegian, German, or English vessels. The Senator from Maine has repeated again and again, and he said it during the present session, that if you undertake to pay the Norwegian sailor or any other sailor less than you pay the American sailor he will not work upon the ship, and you can not sail with such a crew.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] the other day, when it was asserted here that Chinese were employed on the Pacific mail steamships, doubted the proposition, and wanted to know what American ships carried Chinese, and said he never heard of it; and yet the proof was furnished that three-fourths of that crew was made up of Chinese labor, and that they were paid $7.50 a month—that is, $15 in Mexican, which amounts to $7.50 in our money—while the American sailor gets paid $30, and yet no such catastrophe as the Senator from Maine predicted happened. They sailed along together, the Chinaman with his 15 Mexican dollars and the American sailor with his 30 American dollars, and yet no difficulty was produced.

I say, then, that the statement made that you could not hire cheaper has been disproven. It is not true. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] tells us that at Pensacola and the other ports there it does not depend upon the ship in which the man is to sail, but that the amount of wages is the same whether he be hired for English, German, or American ships. When it is claimed, as the Senator from Maine does claim, that the fare on board an American vessel is far better than it is on the other vessel, it is unreasonable to say that these sailors will not work upon the American vessel at the same price that they work upon a German or an English vessel.

I repeat that this was the last foundation and the last hope of the Senator from Maine. If he has failed to show that it does not cost more to operate the American ships, I repeat there is no foundation for the passage of the bill.

But suppose it be true that there is a slight difference in wages paid, does that justify us in breaking down the principle of equality upon which our Government was founded? Does it justify us in passing a law which many of the best lawyers in the country believe to be not authorized by the Constitution? I think even if it were true, there can be no excuse for the Congress of the United States to take this money which belongs to the whole people, and to take it from that class who need it most, and give it to the men who have been named in the article which was read at the Clerk's desk, who need it not at all. I think, Mr. President, it is an act of injustice for which there could be no excuse.

I repeat what I said in effect a year ago. If you can do this, if you can take this money to aid these ships, why can you not take it to aid the farmers, the wheat growers, of Kansas, Minnesota, or any other State, when by chance it may be that their crops are destroyed? If you can give these men a subsidy, why can you not give the cotton farmers of the South a bounty, where often the raising of the cotton costs more than the price received? Why can you not give them a bounty upon the amount of cotton shipped abroad?

I would not vote for such a proposition because I believe it to be outside of the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from New York upon yesterday sneered at what he called Democratic conscience, and referred to the river and harbor bill. He stated in his speech that the Democrats claimed the river and harbor bill to be unconstitutional.

I do not think I have ever heard a Democratic speaker make such an assertion as that. Certainly since I have been here I have never heard any man stand upon this floor and say that we did not have the right to appropriate money to improve the rivers and harbors of the country. The navigable rivers and the harbors upon our coasts are under the control and jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. Congress can control them. Congress can keep bridges from being built across them; it can prevent all obstructions. It is directly and specifically within the power of the Constitution for Congress to appropriate for their improvement.

How the Senator from New York, who I believe to be on the Judiciary Committee, could in any way associate the improvement of rivers and harbors under the Constitution with the proposition to give money for subsidies passes my comprehension. I believe we have the right to improve our rivers and harbors. I know that there can not be a question but that we have the undoubted right, and it is the duty of Congress to appropriate for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country.

The Senator also alluded to the arid-land act, which passed the Senate a few days ago. Mr. President, I did not vote for that act. I voted against it in committee, and I stated upon the floor of the Senate that I could not vote for it. My objection to it was that I doubted its constitutionality. I thought that in all probability it was not in the power of Congress to pass the bill. I sympathized with the people who live in the arid-land States, and I would have been glad to have aided them in any way I could; but believing that, I was unwilling to vote for the bill.

Yet I should say, Mr. President, that there is far more constitutional warrant for that appropriation than there is for this subsidy bill. The constitutionality of such an act can be well argued, inasmuch as Congress has the right to dispose of the public lands of the United States. Congress has granted lands for school purposes again and again. If Congress could do that, it can appropriate the proceeds which arise from them for the purposes indicated in the bill which has already passed.

Congress years ago appropriated $15,000 a year to all the agricultural colleges throughout the United States. A doubt was then expressed as to whether it had the power to make such an appropriation, and in order to meet that doubt the then Senator from Vermont, Mr. Morrill, who prepared the bill, provided that the proceeds of the public lands from the various States should be used for that purpose. If that bill be constitutional, then the arid-land bill is constitutional, though, as I have before said, the remarks of the Senator from New York do not apply to me, because I did not vote for the arid-land bill.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] said the other day that this was merely a question of dollars and cents; that much had been said about placing everything upon a dollar-and-cent basis, and yet the opponents of the bill were opposing it on that ground. Mr. President, I speak alone for myself when I say that the question of dollars and cents is the least objectionable part of the bill to me. That to which I object is the inequality and the injustice of taking the people's money and giving it to this syndicate, this corporation. Such a policy is calculated to weaken the love and affection of the people of this nation for the Government under which they live. Such a policy builds up enormous wealth in a few hands, and when thus it is united it enables the owners of it to commit wrongs upon the remainder of the people of the United States.

When you combine great wealth and great interests in a few hands it enables them to control legislation. I say it is an injustice to the people, and it is upon this ground that I object to the bill. Such legislation when it comes to be known will sooner or later cause discontent and dissatisfaction among the thousands and hundreds of thousands of laboring men, those who work in the shops and upon the farms, who toil from the rising to the setting of the sun. It will weaken their love and confidence and faith in the Government under which they live.

Mr. President, the government which will protect the weak against the strong, that government which will deal out equal and absolute justice to every class and every citizen will endure longest and will longest command the love and admiration of the people of a nation.

I oppose this bill because it is not fair to other interests. I oppose it because it uses and appropriates money for a class, and not for the whole people.

The Senator from Maine said that the justification of the measure is that it is protection. He said that the money would go to protect these great interests which are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and he said we had been doing it for years, and that we are doing it to-day. He said that on account of the difference of wages it was necessary and proper that we should do it.

Well, Mr. President, if you want to open up the flood gates, what will be the consequences? It will not be many years before the cry will be raised that the labor in Maine and Massachusetts and in New England is higher paid than the labor in Georgia and South Carolina and North Carolina. If you can pass this bill because foreigners work for less wages than American workmen, the same power, the same influences but a few years from now will come and say that the cotton mills of New England can not compete with the negro labor in the South, and therefore you must take from the Treasury of the United States a sufficient amount to make up the difference and pay it to the manufacturers of New England. There can be no objection made to such a bill which can not be made to this measure. It is the precedent, it is the injustice, it is the wrong which is to be perpetrated upon the American Government to which I object more than the amount involved. I want to see this Government administered fairly, in the interests of all. I want to see each man have an equal chance, with special benefits to none—each man an equal chance in the race of life. That is all that any man could ask. That is what any American citizen has a right to demand.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] directed a question to me in the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I did not care to interrupt him at the time, and I will now undertake to answer it.

Mr. BERRY. I did not hear the Senator; I beg pardon.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to reply to the question of the Senator from Arkansas. I did not care to interrupt him during his speech. He asked why in this bill provision is not made for the fast-mail contracts, the same as in the bill of 1891.

The Senator is well aware that one of the principal objections urged by the other side to the bill of 1891 was that in limiting the speed for carrying the United States mails to fast ships it was class legislation, and put it entirely without the power of any other line except the American Line, so called, to compete for that class of service. Now, the objection comes that provisions are not made for fast ships at all, leaving it optional. Of course it is left optional; and if the Senator will study the provisions of the bill he can understand why that is done. It is because certain mail routes are provided for to the Orient, to South America, and to Australia, on which it would not be profitable to put 20-knot ships.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I have heard that statement made several times. Where are these routes provided for?

Mr. HANNA. Where are they provided for?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. They are not in the bill.

Mr. HANNA. The bill specifies a weekly line to the Orient, one from Seattle and one from San Francisco, or one from Puget Sound and one from San Francisco.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me a moment?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. That which I spoke of as not being in this bill, but which was in the act of 1891, did not refer to the character of ships of which the Senator is talking. I said the bill of 1891 provided specifically that the mail from New York to Great Britain should be carried in not less than a 20-knot ship. It was a provision applying to the mails to Great Britain. I did not complain that it was taken out, but I said it had been taken out and that my belief was it had been done in order to let the International Navigation Company bring in the two new ships that are now being built in the Cramps' shipyard and get this subsidy, although they are only 17-knot ships. That is what I said.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator in his remarks just now in reply to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. HANNA. I have not gotten through with my reply to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CLAY. To state that this bill provides for new routes to be established. If it does I have not properly read it, and I would be glad to have the Senator point out the page.

Mr. HANNA. It is in the report on the bill.

Mr. CLAY. The report of the committee says that in all probability certain routes will be established, but the bill makes no provision for any route whatever.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose the Senator from Ohio means——

Mr. CLAY. I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin tell me what the Senator from Ohio means.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what the Senator means if he adheres to the statement as he made it.

Mr. HANNA. I have not got through making my statement.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a good reason why I do not know what the Senator means, then.

Mr. HANNA. That is satisfactory. The Senator from Arkansas was discussing and taking for granted what the bill means, and he spoke about the limitation of $9,000,000 in the bill of 1891, and the reduction of this bill to $6,000,000 per annum.

Mr. BERRY. Not the bill of 1891, Mr. President.

Mr. HANNA. I mean the bill of 1901. I beg pardon.

Mr. BERRY. Yes; the bill of the last Congress.

Mr. HANNA. The Senator spoke as to what it was the purpose to do with the other $3,000,000. The Senator knows full well that the $9,000,000 in the bill of 1901 was the sum paid as a maximum amount that could be expended under any conditions. Whether they reached that point or not would depend entirely upon whether the bill was to be a success to that extent. It simply placed a maximum amount. The operations of the bill might carry it to $6,000,000, or to $7,000,000, or even to $9,000,000, but it must stop at that figure. As to the carrying of the mails upon fast lines, it was stated then that the only postal contract under the provision of the bill of 1891 would be with the American Line, a line to Australia, a line to Central America and the West Indies. Beyond that there had been no increase under the bill of 1891.

The provisions of the bill of 1902 extend the postal service to vessels of seven classes, making a knot per hour as the difference between the class for which consideration must be paid. It begins with 20 knots and goes to 14. Under those provisions the Postmaster-General is authorized to make his contracts. To assume that the Postmaster-General, acting for the Government of the United States, would do other than that which was for the best interests of the United States, is going, in my judgment, Mr. President, too far by way of argument; and to say of those on this side of the Chamber who are favoring this measure for public interests and for the development of our merchant marine that the power behind that motive is to build up monopolies or to favor any syndicate for the control of ocean freights is unfair. If a newspaper article, as read at the desk to-day, is to be taken as the authority to prove that statement, I think it is hardly worth consideration. It does not make any difference who buys foreign ships, or how many, not one ton of those ships under the provisions of this bill could be admitted to the American register; not one ton of those ships could avail itself of the benefits of this bill, and the Senator from Arkansas is fully aware of that fact.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I said the ships could not be admitted to American register without an act of Congress. I said Congress could admit them to the American register, as it had frequently done before.

Mr. HANNA. And the Senator went further and insinuated that because of the power and control of this syndicate and the enormous amount of money in their hands that influence would affect the action of Congress if application was made to admit these vessels to American registry. If they could be admitted to American registry there is inducement enough to enjoy the privileges of our coastwise trade. There would be no inducement to be admitted to American registry to enjoy the benefits of the provisions of this bill as compared with the benefits that would come to them by an American register for the benefit of our coastwise trade.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to go into any further discussion of the bill, but in the absence of the Senator from Maine who has charge of the measure I want to assure the Senator from Arkansas that those who drafted the bill and who are urging its provisions to-day upon this floor are actuated by just as high motives of patriotism as the Senator from Arkansas and they are just as free from any embarrassment to control their feelings and their votes upon this great economic question.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator from Ohio still insist that the bill contains a provision which sets forth the new routes to be established?

Mr. HANNA. No; I do not, because I was referring to the report.

Mr. CLAY. I thought the Senator was mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I should not venture to trespass upon the time of the Senate for the purpose of discussing the pending measure were it not for the fact that I am the only member west of the Rocky Mountains upon the Committee on Commerce who joined with the majority in making a report in favor of the passage of the bill. We who come from the Far West—from the Pacific coast States—have a great interest, as well as the whole country, in reviving and rehabilitating if possible the merchant marine of our country. The time was when the United States had the supremacy of the maritime commerce of the world. The time was when, if any of us visited a foreign port, be it Liverpool, Havre, Antwerp, or any great commercial port, whether a sailor before the mast or walking the quarter deck of the ship, he was greeted by the Stars and Stripes floating at the peak of eight-tenths of the ships engaged in the carrying trade of the world in every great commercial port of Europe, while to-day you may visit those ports and if out of one hundred ships you see one flying the Stars and Stripes you will be fortunate indeed.

Many plans have been proposed whereby we might rehabilitate and restore our flag to its place in the carrying trade of the ocean, among them differential duties, export bounties, premiums on home-built ships, exemption from taxes and tonnage dues, subventions, and free ships. All these have been discussed from time to time. Many measures have been presented to Congress and have been considered session after session, but none have materialized and been enacted into laws and placed upon our statute books. So, Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the author of this bill, in 1891 presented a bill which he believed embodied the correct principles whereby the end which we so much desire might be brought about. This bill is an amendment to that bill, an amendment carrying out the general principles, and I am surprised at my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] when he states that this bill has no redeeming features. I think he said it was a bad one in every respect, that one of its bad features is that it does not provide a limitation in time. It seems to me that is one of the good features of the bill.

I want to say in passing, Mr. President, that I can not see why this should be made a partisan measure, for I believe as firmly as I know that I stand here that every patriotic American wants to see the commerce of our country restored to where it properly belongs in the carrying trade of the world on the ocean, on the great waterways of nature. We only differ as to the mode and manner by which we may arrive at that end. So I can not see, as I have said, why this should be a party question. I expected my Democratic friends would join hands with us in enacting this bill into law, for there has been eliminated from it every bad feature, it seems to me.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO FOREIGN SHIPPING THE FORMER POLICY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

I have been more or less connected all my life with maritime affairs. I know something of them by experience. A wise man may learn from the experience of others, and one not wise ought to learn something from his own experience. So I thought my Democratic friends would join hands with us in this matter. I can not understand why they do not do so, unless it is that the principles of the Democratic party to-day are very different from what they were in 1845, when a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President enacted the first subsidy law, and American-built ships were successfully operated for ten years in the trans-Atlantic trade. That sterling Democrat, James Madison, led his party in Congress in 1789 in the enactment of laws that gave American ships decided preferences in the carrying of our foreign commerce.

Under that wise and beneficent legislation, American ships gained the carrying of all but about 7 per cent of that trade, and held it for sixty years. The Democratic party placed on our statute books eighty-five years ago a law which is there to-day, prohibiting foreign-built vessels engaging in our coastwise trade. The very eloquent and able speech of the Senator from Missouri

[Mr. VEST] advocates the repeal of the law prohibiting the registry in the United States of foreign-built ships, a law which was enacted by Democrats. The Democratic party has been in power a great many years since that law was enacted; they have had both branches of Congress and the Presidency during many years since the law was placed upon our statute books, but they have not had the temerity to repeal it, because they knew full well that the people would not sustain them at the ballot box if they did.

Thomas Jefferson, the revered founder of the Democratic party, was an earnest advocate and defender of legislation giving advantage to American ships in competition with foreign vessels. He declared that agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation constituted the four pillars of our prosperity. I beg to commend the study of Jefferson's Encyclopedia to my friends who are opposing this bill. As I read it here it seems to me that he advocated then what are to-day the principles of the Republican party, and if I read it correctly, if he were alive to-day and here in this Senate we should find him advocating and voting for so wise and beneficent a measure as this appears to me to be.

But my friends say that this bill is contrary to the principles of Democracy. Mr. President, none know better than your honorable self [Mr. BACON in the chair] that in 1845 a Democratic Congress passed a subsidy law which, in effect, authorized the Postmaster-General to pay a certain subsidy for the transportation of the mails across the ocean, and in 1852, under the provisions of that act, we were paying $2,000,000 a year for the transportation of our mails across the ocean. Two million dollars was more in amount, so to speak, in value than $10,000,000 is to-day; at least it was harder to get such an amount then than it would now be to get the larger amount I have named.

But my distinguished friend from Missouri says, once you enact this law, it will be like the right of suffrage, it can never be taken away; it is but the beginning of the end. I do not know much about the denial of the right of suffrage, but if the truth is half told in the public press, which seems to be authority here, and which is read from the Secretary's desk from time to time, some of our States, at least, have been quite successful in restricting the right of suffrage within their borders.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO TRY THE EXPERIMENT.

But we need not go to that. Our own experience since we have been in Congress brings before us most vividly the fact that in 1891 Congress passed an act giving a bounty of 2 cents a pound upon cane and beet sugar produced in this county of 90 degrees polariscopic test. Congress then made a contract, so far as it was possible for Congress to make a contract, that this bounty should continue for fourteen years; and yet, in a political cyclone such as comes over the country at times, three years later the political complexion of Congress changed, and that act, after it had been in force only three years, was repealed. Therefore, Mr. President, if Congressmen under another Administration differing politically from the present could repeal an act solemnly enacted, whereby they agreed to do a certain thing for fourteen years, surely, when we fix no time, the next Congress can repeal this act, if it should become a law, should they desire to do so. It seems to me we have nothing to fear in that respect.

Mr. President, I believe, as I have stated, that it is our duty as legislators to try this experiment; it is our duty to profit by the experience of other countries and to carry out this plan of legislation, which has been carefully considered and matured. If it does not prove wise and expedient and patriotic to continue it, then the same power which created it can repeal it in one year or two years, or whenever it is proven to be a failure. I hope, however, that it will be a grand success and that it will continue in operation until we shall have regained our place in the commerce of the world.

I want to say to my friend from Arkansas, who drew such a doleful picture of the monopoly of these great corporations that are to enjoy the benefits or the privileges which he claims this bill will give them, that there are no special privileges on the great ocean, which is nature's highway; there is no special right of way; there is no franchise required. Anyone can navigate the pathless ocean who has the necessary credit, and many men have it, to build a vessel to sail the ocean and compete with any corporation in the world.

There can be no special privileges under this bill. It gives none to any corporation, to any company, or to any individual. An association of cotton growers, an association of wheat growers, of corn growers, or of cattle raisers can build a vessel and transport what they have to sell to Europe, to South America, to Asia, or to any country in the world, and they can navigate their ship without asking the privilege of anyone while doing so.

CONDITION OF AMERICAN CARRYING TRADE ON THE OCEAN.

Mr. President, during the past fiscal year the foreign commerce of the United States amounted to $2,151,935,000. Of this immense amount of goods, American vessels carried only $177,398,000 worth, or 8.2 per cent. Nearly $2,000,000,000 worth of exports and imports were carried on vessels flying a foreign flag. Of a total tonnage of 59,597,000 entered and cleared in the foreign trade a foreign flag covered 79 per cent. Of our exports and imports from Europe American vessels carried only 3.07 per cent; British North America, Central America, and the West Indies, which lie at our very doors, only 45.74 per cent; South America, 13.45 per cent; Asia, 6.42 per cent; Oceania, where we have extensive possessions, 41.28 per cent.

The tonnage of American vessels engaged in the foreign trade in 1901 was 889,129, against 1,410,648 tons in 1872, a decrease of 37 per cent in thirty years. During the same period Germany's tonnage increased from 1,098,846 to 2,720,054 tons, and Great Britain's fleet engaged in foreign trade from 4,392,056 tons to 8,290,413 tons. The comparison should make every American citizen blush. If it does not, the following facts I am sure will, if he will only consider them:

The total tonnage of American steamships engaged in foreign trade is 327,284 tons. The North German Lloyd Company—a single German private enterprise—has 424,475 tons of steamships engaged in the same trade, 25 per cent more than the total steam tonnage under the American flag. The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company alone has 286,515 tons of steamships in the foreign trade, and the French Messageries Maritimes has 246,277 tons. One of the foreign steamship lines, therefore, greatly exceeds in tonnage the entire American steam tonnage in foreign trade, and each of two more companies nearly equals it, while every one of these companies surpasses our entire foreign merchant fleet, sail and steam combined, by 20 to 100 per cent in tonmiles, which represent the amount of business done. These three foreign steamship companies—one English, one French, and one German—alone do five times the business that the entire sail and steam merchant fleet of America performs in the ocean-carrying trade of the world.

While we have an immense trade with Europe, aggregating $1,468,000,000 in 1900, not a single American vessel entered or cleared at a port of Germany, Russia, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Italy, Austria-Hungary, or Greece. This foreign trade in 1901 increased very materially over the previous year, but only 62,435 tons net were added to American registered steam tonnage, while a single foreign steamship company has under construction 96,000 tons of ocean steamships for its international trade.

SINGLE FOREIGN COMPANIES EXCEED THE ENTIRE AMERICAN TONNAGE.

We thus see that in the matter of a merchant marine engaged in foreign trade the United States bears hardly an appreciable relation to European maritime nations, but only to single private commercial companies. We have indeed sunk to that low level. In a field where we once occupied a position second to Great Britain, with every prospect of surpassing that nation and becoming the ocean carriers of the world, we are as a nation hardly even a rival of a single German, English, or French company.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from California permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. As the Senator from California is perfectly familiar with the ship business—I understand he has been in the business all his life—I will ask him a question. Take the trans-Pacific trade. It is about 7,000 miles from the Pacific coast to Japan and China, and in that trade we employ largely Chinese labor. It is about 11,000 or 12,000 miles, as I understand, from England, France, and Germany to China through the Suez Canal. I desire to ask the Senator how we can possibly have any trouble in competing with England, France, or Germany in the China trade when our Pacific coast is 5,000 miles nearer and our shipping men employ the cheapest labor in the world?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, under the provisions of this bill those vessels that are to receive any benefit from it must for the first two years have at least 25 per cent of their respective crews composed of American citizens, during the next three years 33⅓ per cent, and after that 50 per cent. No American ship can therefore employ Chinese as a crew, because they are not American citizens and can not become American citizens; and my friend from Georgia, who has, I believe, crossed the Pacific, is aware that while Chinese may be employed, as they now are by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, as firemen and coal passers, yet no white man will associate with them on shipboard. Therefore, if shipowners wish to derive benefit from this bill it will be necessary for them to employ American citizens or those who are capable of becoming American citizens by making a declaration of their intention to become such.

I want to say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], to my friend from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], and to the other Senators who are opposing this bill that the trouble is not with their reasoning, for that is generally correct, but the trouble is they have arrived at a wrong conclusion. They are not to be blamed, perhaps, for we frequently read the decisions of some of the great courts of the United States and are left in doubt as to what the conclusion will be until we come to the end. The reasoning of the Senators is correct, but the result at which they arrive, not to vote with the majority on this side in favor of this bill, shows that though they reason well, their conclusions are wrong.

THE AMERICAN SAILOR.

I believe in the American sailor. I believe that his is an honorable vocation. I believe this bill will encourage more people to follow the sea and become American seamen than any other legislation that has been enacted since I have been in Congress. I believe that this law will offer an inducement to the cotton raisers in the State of Georgia, where there are such splendid forests of pine, to build ships and man them with American sailors representing the homes of Georgia. I believe Alabama will find need for her iron and her coal. Her iron ore she will send to the furnaces, where it will be turned into pig iron, from that into billets of steel; then to the rolling mills, where it will be rolled out into sheets and fashioned and framed and made into ships.

I believe there will be a local pride in this, and that a new stimulus will be given to the industry of the South. That is why I thank the Senator for calling my attention to this point. It seems to me that is the very kernel, that is the very gist of this bill. It builds up and fosters American industry. Every vessel that is built in this country is a matter of interest, directly or indirectly, to everyone. Every head of a family represents five persons, as our census shows; he is a taxpayer in the community; he builds churches and supports the schools, where he educates his boys and girls in the great duties of American citizenship. There is a commendable pride and a feeling of patriotism which comes to him when he is conscious that he is helping to build something that is going to plow the ocean; that he is helping to build a vessel, helping to create something that will be a benefit to the world and to commerce.

I opposed the measure that was before the Senate a year ago because it permitted vessels built on the Clyde and built in other countries to come in here and compete with those built by our own people.

When a ship is built in England it is customary for the managing owner of the vessel to go among his friends and propose to divide the ownership of that vessel among twenty or thirty people. They all put something into the vessel, and so it becomes a family affair, so to speak. We ought to have such a system here. The splendid forests of yellow pine of Georgia will furnish the spars and decks and the houses to help build these splendid ships; Alabama will furnish the steel and iron to help construct them; Missouri will send her lead and zinc to help construct them; and so every State in the Union will add something toward building this beautiful specimen of nautical architecture that is to be the pride and glory of this country, and above it all is to fly the Stars and Stripes at her peak.

OUR FLAG ABROAD.

Mr. President, when, as a sailor boy, I was in foreign countries—in Norway, Sweden, Russia, and elsewhere—as I approached the residence of the American consul and saw flying there the Stars and Stripes, I almost felt as if a voice came to me like that which came to Moses out of the burning bush, and I felt I stood upon sacred ground. I involuntarily raised my hat. So I want every American boy to feel to-day that he ought to support this measure, because it helps to make American seamen, and helps to make American mechanics feel pride in the work in which they are engaged.

But, returning again to these companies in Germany, in England, and in France, this condition of affairs, mortifying in the extreme to a nation such as ours, which was once successfully striving for the mastery of the seas, is not due to lack of enterprise on the part of our people. They are putting their money into ships engaged in foreign trade by the tens of millions of dollars. American capitalists now own 672,455 tons of steamships engaged in ocean commerce, more than twice the tonnage of the entire American steam fleet, but all these ships sail under a foreign flag—British, German, Mexican, or Cuban.

For the life of me I can not understand why my friend from Arkansas, or my friend from Georgia, or any other Senator, should object to Americans putting their money into foreign vessels if they wish to do so. They can not come under the American flag, and unless they are built in this country and constructed by American mechanics, and unless one-half of the crew are American citizens, they can not enjoy any benefits that may accrue to them by reason of the enactment of this bill into law.

How much money these foreign vessels are yearly earning—most of which vast sum is paid by our own producers and taken abroad to aid foreign producers to compete with our own—is far larger than the patriotic American likes to contemplate. The figures representing the freight charges now exceed those of the entire revenue of the United States derived from the tariff on imported goods.

FOREIGN SHIP FREIGHT CHARGES EQUAL OUR TARIFF REVENUE.

I sent to the Treasury Department a few days ago, out of curiosity, to ascertain what in the past thirty years we had paid out, on an average, for foreign transportation of our own products in foreign vessels and how much we had received in revenue from our protective tariff. I will not weary the Senate by going through year by year from 1870 to 1901, but I shall embody the table in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Year.	Revenue from tariff.	Foreign ship freight charges.

Total	5,999,449,241	5,867,671,350
Annual average	187,482,789	183,367,542

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that the annual average revenue for thirty years from the tariff, of which we have heard so much from time to time, was $187,482,789. We have paid out in thirty years to foreign shipowners for freight carried by their vessels, as near as it is possible for the Treasury to give me the information, on an average of $183,367,542. There was nearly as much paid to foreign shipowners, and the money has gone across the Atlantic; gone into foreign countries to keep up their palatial homes, their preserves for hunting, and for luxuries, which some of us Americans are imitating. But I hope it never will become a fad in this country to the extent that it is there. We have contributed this much money, which they are enjoying. So we are not ahead, financially speaking, on our tariff.

It is an object lesson which appeals most strongly to the student of political economy who will give this question the thoughtful consideration that he should in considering a matter of this magnitude—one so far-reaching in its importance to the welfare and prosperity of our country as a nation and which affects every individual and every home in the land.

WHY AMERICAN CAPITAL IS NOT PUT INTO AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE FOREIGN TRADE.

Mr. President, do not misunderstand me. I have the greatest respect and admiration for our good friends across the water. I do not envy them anything. I would profit by their example and by their experience. I would emulate them in their business enterprise. I would emulate them in what they are doing in fostering and building up the great steamships and the great vessels of their countries, and if we do profit advantageously we will sow the seeds of prosperity in our own country which will yield a hundredfold in its harvest.

Considering the fact that American capital is and has been willing to enter into the ocean carrying business, what is the reason why our ocean merchant marine has diminished steadily from year to year in spite of a rapid increase in the business to be done, and that it has been left far behind, both as to tonnage and work performed, by single foreign steamship companies? Capital is invested that it may make interest. If interest could have been earned by American ships, it is undoubtedly true that capital would have been invested in them. Why interest could not be earned is plain. It is because of the greater cost of American-built vessels and the greater cost of running them as compared with ships built and run under foreign flags.

This increased cost in both cases is due to the higher wages of the American workingman. They increase the cost of building the ship and of manning it after construction. The difference eats up the profits which would result if the cost of the ship had been that of a foreign-constructed vessel and if the expenses of running it had been only that of vessels manned by foreign crews. And besides this, the margin of profit is still further reduced by the fact that American ships would lack those payments by the government to foreign lines, which are made for the encouragement of foreign commerce. In order to compete and secure a fair share of business, an American vessel must be in a position to earn at least as much as a foreign vessel of the same class. Whenever conditions are such that this can be done, American capital will go into American ships, and not before.

THE COASTING TRADE.

I wish to say in passing that our friends from Arkansas and Georgia have laid great stress upon the shipbuilding industry of this country and its increase. It is principally brought about because of our increased coasting trade. We have, I think, about 10,000 miles of coast from Maine to California—from Maine to Galveston, from San Diego to Point Barrow—and the great development, especially on the Pacific coast and in Alaska, has increased the demand for vessels which has at once given a new impetus to shipbuilding in this country.

This coasting trade is what has helped to make American sailors. It is what has stimulated and built up the commerce of our coast. By implication my friend the Senator from Arkansas stated that the citizens of no other country enjoyed similar privileges in their country. He is mistaken in that respect. While in the coasting trade of England and Germany there may not be vessels of other nationalities, no privilege is given to foreigners to trade there to advantage; and while England permits coasting vessels from other countries to go there, I do not know of a single instance on record where a foreign vessel is engaged in the trade on the coast of England. England is very jealous of her colonies. She protects their coasting interests, and no American vessel can go on the coast of Nova Scotia or Canada or British Columbia and there engage in the coasting trade.

An incident came to my knowledge a short time since where a vessel leaving the port of Victoria, in British Columbia, for Nanaimo, in the same country, a distance of only 80 miles, as a special accommodation took on board a passenger. It made no charge, because it was a personal accommodation to take him. He was a merchant, and desired to go from Victoria to Nanaimo, and he had no other means of going for a week or ten days. This vessel took him as a personal accommodation, and the authorities of British Columbia fined that ship $50 and refused to remit the penalty. England is jealous of the coasting trade of her colonies, and is careful in protecting it against inroads of the United States or any other country whose vessels might be sent there to compete for a part of the coasting business.

WHAT THE BILL WILL DO.

The purpose of this bill is to create these necessary conditions. Some of our friends do not like the word "subsidy." So I will use a new word. By this bill we propose, by means of differential payments, to accomplish certain results. That is a better term than "subsidy" perhaps. It is not very much different perhaps in reality, but it is like music—there is no discord in it. It is euphonious.

The purpose of this bill is to create those necessary conditions. By it we propose, by means of certain differential payments, to make up to the shipowner the increased cost of construction, the increased cost of running his vessel, and to give him a sum of money to offset that given by foreign governments to his rivals. And I believe that this bill will effect that end. But in return for this aid the bill provides that certain public services shall be performed, and encouragement is given to create new lines of transoceanic communication under the American flag which will have an important economic bearing on the future progress of the United States.

The Senator from Maine, who is the author of this bill, as also of the shipping act of 1891, has, I think, fully demonstrated the ability of the measure to place American-built vessels on an equal footing with those of foreign construction and sailing under foreign flags. I need not, therefore, refer to this point again, as I think no one will question his demonstration, unless perhaps our friends on the other side, perfect in all respects excepting one, are like some of our sea captains. Some of our sea captains who have been successful navigators for a great many years, who have taken their ships across the trackless ocean, were by recent order of the Treasury Department directed to undergo a new examination for color blindness.

Men who thought they were physically perfect, with no defects, were found, when the basket of worsted was placed before them, unable to tell the difference in the shades of green and red; and so the Government in its wisdom took from them their licenses as pilots. They can not navigate their ships within a league of the shore. So our friends on the other side, in order to find some fault with this bill, are color-blind to its virtues, and they are color-blind when we try to show them its merits and what it will do for them.

We are always trying to do for our Democratic friends something that will benefit them. You know what we told them when they passed the Wilson-Gorman bill some years ago. We said, "It will injure you. It will bring distress to your homes and to your families. Stand with us, and we will help you. We will keep this great evil from you." They said, "No; the decree has gone forth. It must pass." And so they suffered as the children of Israel did in Egypt when for a time they were obstinate and failed to observe the commands of the Great Ruler of all things. They were kept there until we elected a Republican President and a Republican Congress, and then we brought them relief, and to-day they are sitting in their own beautiful homes, under the protection of their fig leaf and vine, and they are getting 7 and 8 cents a pound for cotton, when under their bill they were getting only about 4 cents, or very much less than it cost them to produce it.

So, after this bill has been in force for a few years, they will say, "We thank you very much." My friend the Senator from Virginia is taking a seat near me. We will do more for Virginia by this bill and we have done more under the McKinley Act than was done by forty years of Democratic administration. Go with me to the Newport News yard and see the magnificent specimens of naval architecture there, a plant putting money into the pockets of citizens of that State.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks the bill we are now considering is responsible for that condition?

WHAT THE DISCUSSION OF THE QUESTION HAS DONE.

Mr. PERKINS. In a great measure. They knew the wisdom of the majority of the Republican party, and, profiting by their experience, they knew we would do something good and wonderful for them, and so we are doing it now against their protest. We are doing it for them in spite of their protest, and I know they will thank us, as they do for the other measure which has been so wise and beneficial to all citizens in our land.

Newport News has one of the grand shipyards of the country to-day. My friend the Senator from Virginia may not vote for this bill, because my Democratic friends can not all do as they would like to do. They say that about us Republicans, but yet we sometimes think we are quite independent about it. We may let somebody hold the reins, but we drive. So our friend the Senator from Virginia may not vote for this bill, and yet in his heart of hearts he knows what it means for Virginia and for Newport News.

I expect shipyards to be located in Georgia—in Savannah. I expect shipyards to be established in Charleston, S. C. My friend the Senator from South Carolina is not present to-day, but I think I can convince him that it will be to the interest of the country, under the provisions of this bill, to have shipyards immediately established in two or three ports in his own State. We have secured 20 feet of water over Brunswick Bar, so that we may have a shipyard there.

I wish to say, parenthetically, as it occurs to me now, that this story of full shipyards and that we can not build any more ships is a bogy man of the sea. Times are different now from what they were when a ship was built in a single yard. Take the Cramp plant at Philadelphia. The work there done is practically an assembling, so to speak, of the different parts which have been made at rolling mills and machine shops throughout the country. The Bethlehem works have forged the great shaft; a machine shop has cast the cylinders and bored them out and trued them up. Another one has fashioned the frames. Another has rolled out the great sheets of steel. They are all sent forward to this yard, and there, under the direction of the naval architect, they are assembled by skilled American workmen. Thus the vessel is constructed.

On the Pacific coast alone—take my own home, San Francisco—during the past three years we have constructed there and at Oakland four new shipyards, which are prepared to turn out ships of any size. On Puget Sound there is room for twenty more splendid shipyards if the business offers. So in Oregon, so in Delaware, Maryland, and at every coast port and in every State on the Atlantic or the Gulf of Mexico.

The more I think of this measure, the more I consider it, the more deeply am I impressed that it is a blessing which comes to our friends undisguised. They do not seem to realize the good it will confer upon them, or else they would make it unanimous and say, "We will try it, at least for a few years."

I did not mean to digress so much, but there are so many things that can be said, and I do not know but that it is better to get away from the text than to confine one's self to it.

THE COMMERCIAL FUTURE OF THE UNITED STATES.

During the past few years the United States has made vast strides industrially and politically. The position which they now occupy is, in the opinion of more than one close observer, tending to change the current of the world's trade. We have invaded European markets with our wares, and are in a position to compete with European nations in the markets of the Orient. Our production is fast exceeding our power of consumption, and we must reach out for purchasers beyond our shores, as England has done and as Germany is doing, not only by giving large sums of money to her vessels, but by an export bounty upon beet sugar and Government aid to other industries.

The shores of the Pacific are to be the future commercial battle ground of the nations—the Pacific shores of Asia and of North and South America. An isthmian canal is to be constructed which will place us in the center of the trade of the two great oceans of the globe, but to secure to ourselves the vast benefits which should be ours from that position we must have the power to influence that trade, and that can be done only through ships bearing the American flag and manned by Americans whose interests lie in this country and not in another. To be the focus of the world's trade we must be connected with all the continents by constantly and imperceptibly turning attention to our own shores. We have a large trade with Japan, which is carried on in part by a line of Japanese steamships larger and better than those of any American line on the Pacific.

JAPAN'S AID TO HER COMMERCE.

Why they are better is because the Japanese Government gives to the company owning them the most liberal aid given to any existing line of shipping, aggregating $2,362,148 per year, in addition to the large sums paid for the encouragement of navigation and for the encouragement of shipbuilding. Think of that! Japan, a country hardly known to the outside world a few years ago, is paying to-day a subsidy aggregating $2,362,148 per year. As the result of this liberality to the company 12 fine vessels have just been added to the already large merchant fleet of Japan, each of which, according to the Marine Journal, receives $50,000 per trip, the expenses of which are $75,000. Thus the aid given by Japan averages two-thirds the actual cost to the company of each voyage.

This calls to my mind one of the defects of this bill, as pointed out by the Senator from Arkansas. He said it was a vicious bill; that it had no good features in it, because there was no provision which would compel the owners of a vessel to carry at least 50 per cent of its capacity in cargo. What a logical, what a splendid argument! In order to get this subsidy a ship would sail in ballast. In order to earn a hundred dollars the ship would pay out a hundred and fifty dollars, for that is about the proportion it would be. Aye, more than that. In order to earn a hundred dollars subsidy under this bill a ship would go in ballast and pay a hundred and seventy-five dollars for doing so. The Americans are enterprising and liberal, but they do not do business in that way. I do not think such an argument is particularly logical. I am sure my friend the Senator from Arkansas if he had operated a vessel, would realize the fact that the subsidy paid does not begin to pay one-half of the operating expenses of the ship, to say nothing of the insurance, to say nothing of the interest upon the investment and the wear and tear of the vessel. I think that effectually disposes of that charge against the bill. If not, we will refer to it later.

It is true that the Japanese vessels take our goods to Yokohama, but it is also true that when they are landed in Japan they have not behind them the prestige which a well-equipped line of American steamships would give, and we lose the benefits of that influence which is always behind the idea of vigor and power that is given by a great merchant fleet. England has pushed her trade throughout the world by this means. Germany has begun in the same way, and her success is marked. We, too, must prepare to enter the commercial battle equally well equipped if we are to hold our own, for the advantages which labor-saving machinery are now giving us will soon be shared by our foreign competitors in manufactures, and we shall have to rely more and more on the universally successful policy of controlling the distribution of our products. If we can in part control the distribution of the products of other nations, so much the better for us—so much nearer we shall be to controlling the trade of the world that our own may not suffer from competition.

NECESSARY FOR AMERICAN INFLUENCE IN FOREIGN MARKETS.

We are lacking in transportation lines through which our influence may be extended to foreign markets. We have an American line to England and France, which has been of great benefit to our commerce on the other side of the Atlantic. Suppose that all the trans-Atlantic lines were American, is it not recognized that the American influence in every great European port would push the sale of American goods in every European country? The extension of our trade there thus far has been by main strength, as it were. We are young, and vigorous, and fresh, and have advantages which foreign nations do not possess, but may soon have. Our goods have been brought to their shores by their own vessels, and have been purchased because they are good and cheap. But had what has been called "the American invasion" been backed by a fleet of American vessels as large, in comparison, as the volume of our trade, and increasing in like proportion, is it not conceivable that our invasion would now have taken on the character of a conquest?

We have at our doors in Central and South America large markets to which not an American vessel practically ever goes. Those markets are, as everyone knows, supplied principally by our industrial rivals across the Atlantic, the English and the Germans, whose vessels take thither the products of their shops. Had we in existence lines of steamships as efficient, is it possible that our goods would not be more widely known than they are and their sale much greater than it is likely to be for years to come? If the mere presence in the harbor of Hongkong of Dewey's battle fleet resulted in an increased demand for American goods—which was announced by Consul-General Wildman—and which demand has since increased, what would be the effect of American steamship lines, bearing thither the American influence, in every port of eastern Asia? And eastern Asia is now the prize for which the commercial world is striving. Trade is beginning to flow in that direction, and as it increases the nation that can exercise control over it will reap benefits proportionate to that control. Already there would have been great lines of American steamers from Pacific coast ports to Japan, Korea, China, Manila, Singapore, and Australia had there been a chance to compete with existing foreign lines.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE EVILS OF OUR POSITION.

I am reminded that in a conversation, a few days since, with a gentleman who represents a large agricultural-implement manufactory in this country, he stated that he recently visited the Argentine Republic and Brazil, and there was a great demand for our agricultural implements in those countries, but it was impossible to send them there at a rate of freight which was advantageous, or in a manner which would give that dispatch to their orders which was necessary in order to make a successful sale. He said our only way for shipping to Rio and the Argentine Republic is by sending our goods to England and there having them reshipped back to South America.

There is to my mind, Mr. President, an answer to the observation made by the Senator from Wisconsin a few minutes since, that there is no feature of this bill which provides for the establishment of new lines of steamships. The bill, if I remember it correctly, provides that the aid shall be equitably divided between the Atlantic coast ports, the Gulf ports, and the Pacific coast ports. To South American ports, to Asia, and to every other country our merchants are endeavoring to build up trade by sending samples of their goods and showing the people there the superior quality of American manufactures. They will soon see the opportunities that are presented to them, and people are always ready to make an investment that promises fair returns.

I believe that the provisions of this bill will afford an incentive for the establishment of new lines of transportation, and where you can not force trade now, under the inducement held out by the representatives in Congress here, they will avail themselves of the provisions of this measure, and they will at once build vessels in our own shipyards and send them on these missions of commercial enterprise.

I wish to say, in passing, that I have been a member of the Naval Committee some six years or more, and during the past five years we have made appropriations of about $58,000,000 per annum for the support and equipment and rebuilding of the Navy.

Is there a member of the Senate, is there a patriotic American in this land, who does not approve of such a wise investment where the honor and the dignity and the patriotism of our country are at stake? We pay $58,000,000 per annum for the building of our Navy, while under this bill $6,000,000 per annum will be the largest amount, I believe, which can be paid out in the next five years. If by doing this we can give a new impetus to these great commercial maritime enterprises, is it not our duty to do it? Where the flag goes, there trade follows the flag. What is the good of our Navy except to maintain the honor and dignity of our flag and to serve as a beacon light of patriotism, going about the world showing that this is a country of the people, by the people, and for the people?

I voted for the appropriations for the building of war ships, and I look back upon it with more satisfaction, perhaps, than any other official act that I have performed since I have been here. We have had ample reward not only by the brilliant naval victories in Manila Harbor and Santiago de Cuba, but we have shown to the world that we are a great living sea power, as well as land power.

GOVERNMENT AID TO INLAND TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. President, Congress in its wisdom has given to the railroads of this country 200,000,000 acres of land. We have given bounties in the way of guaranteeing interest upon loans, national, State, and municipal. That investment has come back to us a hundredfold in cheap transportation from the Dakotas, from Nebraska, from Wisconsin, from the different inland States to the seaboard. It was a wise investment, I believe, and it was that policy which was commended by, I think, the distinguished Senator from Georgia when he told of the low rates of freight that prevail from Kansas and other inland States to the coast.

Had it not been for the aid given by Congress to those railroads freight to-day would be perhaps three times what it is. I remember that within my own recollection freight rates on the Great Lakes, from Buffalo to some of the ports on Lake Superior, ranged from $3 to $4 a ton. To-day the rate ranges from 60 cents to $1 per ton. This is due to the fact that Congress assisted by river and harbor appropriations in giving them good harbors and in clearing out channels where there was shoal water and helping them, as we have helped Brunswick, in Georgia, where we have made a splendid harbor; as we are helping Savannah, and as we are helping other seaports. The river and harbor bill this year will carry $60,000,000, and I expect to vote for every item in the bill, because I think it is a wise and a judicious expenditure to be made by Congress.

Mr. President, this is a $60,000,000 country, and we ought not to hesitate to appropriate many times $60,000,000 when there is any great improvement required in rivers and harbors or in our Navy, or in anything that tends to develop this country or to build it up for the common good of the general public. As I said, it is, then, our duty to make the appropriation.

This bill gives no special privileges to anyone. As I stated before, there is no single track on the ocean, nature's great highway; there is no special franchise, there is no special privilege. Everyone who has a compass and a quadrant, with a mathematical eye with which he can look at the sun and the stars, can navigate a vessel from any port in the United States to any port in any other country without asking permission from any corporation or any monopoly, as my friend from Arkansas says that corporations and monopolies want to control the provisions of this bill, which he says is to be enacted for their benefit.

I know the Senator does not mean that. He reminds me very much of a chap I once knew in a seaport where I went. The minister was remonstrating with him for swearing. He became quite penitent, and he said, "Parson," and he used a strong adjective, "You pray a great deal and I swear a great deal, and neither of us mean anything by it." [Laughter.] So it is with my friend from Arkansas. He had to talk against the bill, but I do not think he means it, because he is a very excellent gentleman, and ordinarily, especially upon appropriations for rivers and harbors, I have always found him to be most liberal and generous. [Laughter.]

ENCOURAGEMENT OF SHIPBUILDING.

Mr. President, pass the bill which we have under consideration, and you will at once see a revival of shipbuilding from Maine to Texas, from San Diego Bay to Puget Sound. I do not know but that we will carry it up into Alaska, even as far as Point Barrow. My friend from Indiana started there, but the ice kept him away. I do not know but that we will even go that far. It will soon make the industry one of the most important in our country.

Existing plants will be enlarged to execute orders for ships and new ones will be built. The iron, zinc, and lead mines of the Southern States will be called upon to furnish the metals for construction, and the Southern pine forests for wood for decks and spars. All the coast States' resources that can be drawn on for shipbuilding will feel the impulse of increased demand. More blast furnaces, as I have already said, will be erected in Alabama and Georgia, more mines of iron and coal will be opened in Alabama and West Virginia, and new shipyards constructed in Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, as well as other coast States on the Atlantic and Pacific.

We will send increased quantities of coal to be burned in the furnaces that generate the steam and drive these great nautical vehicles through the waters of the ocean laden with the products of our farms. General prosperity will come to us; all will be more or less benefited by it. Every industrial interest will be benefited through the increased prosperity given by the growth of shipbuilding. The prosperity of New England while it was building ships in competition with England is a fact that should not now be lost sight of. Pass this bill, and American lines will at once be organized and American steamships will soon be extending our trade all along the Asiatic, Central and South American coasts.

Pass the bill, and we shall soon be placed by American lines in a position to compete with Europeans in the markets of South America. Pass the bill, and we shall have American lines carrying American ideas and American products to South Africa. Pass the bill, and we shall push our products, through our ships, into the teeming markets of the Mediterranean. American ships will open the world to our producers, will assist them in selling their products, will help them resist competition, and will place behind American goods a force and vigor that will make them "go."

AMERICAN MONEY IN FOREIGN SHIPS.

In consequence of the inability of American ships to compete with those built and sailed under a foreign flag, we have the anomaly of American capital owning and sailing under a foreign flag foreign-built steam vessels of tonnage nearly twice as great as that of American ships in the same trade. Indeed, one purchase of foreign ships last spring nearly equaled the total tonnage of American steamships in the foreign trade. While it is true that the profits of capital thus invested come to America, the prestige of this great fleet goes to Great Britain, and by so much we are the loser. Had it been possible for American vessels to compete with foreign built, the vast cost of the ships of the Leyland Line, purchased in one lot, would have been expended in America among American workingmen, and our increased strength on the ocean would have been measurably augmented and our prestige in the world increased. Had all the foreign ships owned by Americans been built in America, we should have had as remarkable an expansion of the shipbuilding interests of the country as has marked the stupendous development of shipbuilding in Germany, and we should now, with our cheap materials, be able to compete with the world in the work of building ships, with a chance of once again being in a position of becoming the rival of England on the seas.

The German policy of building up a merchant marine to extend and protect German trade has resulted in the development of shipbuilding plants that are second to none in the world, and has thereby added materially to the industrial welfare of Germany. And all this has been accomplished by the simple means of a differential payment to those who will build their ships in German yards and sail them under the German colors. And we have the contrast of a nation that was nonmaritime when the United States was the second maritime country of the world now standing high above us as a sea power, and building for a single company steamships exceeding in tonnage the entire steam registered tonnage of this country. All this has been accomplished through a simple differential payment to offset the advantages of rivals, like that which is proposed by this bill. If such results can flow from the German policy, they can surely result from an American differential payment of the same character and made for the same purpose.

CHANCES FOR FOREIGN TRADE IN COAL.

What may be accomplished for the benefit of one American industry by a fleet of American ocean carriers is set forth incidentally in recent special consular reports dealing with foreign markets for American coal. From all parts of Europe and South America it was reported that there were notable openings for the products of our coal mines, especially from West Virginia, the only thing standing in the way being ocean freights. As long as these rates can be controlled by England, which is the present source of supply, it is not probable that she will ruin her coal-mine owners by carrying American coal to European markets. On this subject our consuls make some interesting statements. Consul Roosevelt, at Brussels, says that Mr. Henry S. Fleming, secretary of the Anthracite Coal Operators' Association, New York, after personally looking over the ground, said that he—was of the opinion that there was a good market in Europe for American coal, but in order to make it profitable we should establish a line of steamers to carry our coal to Europe.

Consul Tourgee, at Bordeaux, reports that—

A party at Bayonne took an option from a coal company in Baltimore on terms that seemed to promise a successful importation, but on wiring to London for freighters to bring over 100,000 tons it was found that freight could not be secured at a rate to make it profitable, and the effort had to be abandoned.

In Consul Tourgee's opinion the question of a profitable export trade in coal depends upon three considerations: The number and capacity of ocean steamers carrying passengers as well as freight; the sailing bounties paid to ships of different nationalities; the number of ships plying direct between the United States and French ports.

It is true—

He says—

that a very large portion of American freight still comes by way of Southampton, Liverpool, and Hamburg, but it is at a great loss to American shippers, who do not seem to realize the facts.

Consul A. M. Thackara, at Havre, writes:

In my opinion the future of an American coal-export trade will greatly depend on the ability of our shippers to secure cheap and expeditious ocean transportation.

Consul John C. Covert, at Lyons, gives a copy of a letter written by Edouard Francon, coal dealer of that city, who says:

I am convinced that if freight rates, which are now very high, could be reduced, American coal would find a very important market in all Mediterranean ports, not only in Marseilles, but also in Italy, defying the competition of English coal, which now monopolizes those markets.

Consul R. P. Skinner, at Marseilles, writes:

As soon as we are prepared to make the sacrifice necessary to reestablish our merchant marine, we shall save for distribution among our own people not only the amount now annually paid out for ocean freights, but we will develop our inexhaustible beds of coal and secure a permanent and profitable trade.

Consul Hugh Pitcairn, at Hamburg, says that—

Unless coal is carried in American bottoms at lower rates of freight, its introduction will be gradual.

WHAT GERMANY'S AID TO HER MERCHANT MARINE HAS ACCOMPLISHED.

In face of the fact that the merchant marine of foreign countries, which stand high above us as ocean carriers, have and do receive Government aid, the opponents of this bill argue that the United States should not give aid to its foreign shipping. The assertion is made, even, that the aid given by foreign nations to their fleets has not been a factor in securing for them the enviable position they now occupy as the world's carriers on the ocean. Let us consider what the lessons are that the experience of our maritime competitors teach. Take first that most recent and most notable example of the acquisition of sea power—Germany—which has the two largest, most powerful, and wealthiest steamship companies that the world has ever seen.

In 1870, Germany had, of vessels of 17½ tons and upwards, 900,361 tons under sail and 81,994 under steam. What proportion of this fleet was seagoing is not given, but probably not much over one-half. The result of the Franco-German war, just concluded, was the creation of the German Empire which thenceforth was to be a mighty factor in the world's history, if German brain and energy could assure to it the prestige it had attained by its great victory. It was invincible on land; it became necessary to become a power on the sea as well, and the first effort of the new Empire was to create a naval and a merchant fleet. Germany was handicapped by want of resources, lack of experience in iron working, and by absence of confidence among German shipowners that their shipyards could turn out vessels that could compete with those of British construction.

The Government, however, began the building of a navy, but its own yards were inadequate for the task and it placed a contract with the Vulcan works, which turned out the fine armored cruiser Preussen. This was the beginning of a maritime growth which has resulted in the vast shipyards at Hamburg, Kiel, Stettin, and Danzig, and the huge steel works of Krupp at Essen. But for ten years the energies of the German Empire were expended principally in creating a navy. After a fair start had been made it turned its attention to the merchant marine, which in 1880 had—coastwise and ocean-going—increased only 200,000 tons, of which 130,000 was steam.

SUBSIDIES TO STEAMSHIP LINES.

Shortly after 1880 the Imperial Government granted important subsidies to the North German Lloyd for an extension of its service to Asia and Australia, with a stipulation that the ships receiving the subsidy must be built in Germany, and as far as possible of German materials. Reduced freight rates on materials for shipbuilding were granted, and every monetary obstacle to acquiring such material at the lowest cost was removed. Six imperial mail steamers were constructed by the Vulcan works, coming up to the best standards of British and French construction. The effect of this success, coupled with the subsidies to steamship lines and the further government aid given in the shape of bounties for construction, of low railroad rates on material, etc., was, as Consul Mason reports, a rush of orders for merchant steamers to the Hamburg, Kiel, Danzig, Stettin, and other yards.

The result was that the German steam marine increased from 215,758 tons in 1880 to 723,652 tons in 1890, to 1,038,391 in 1898, and to 1,150,159 tons in 1899. Of this fleet the seagoing steamers numbered 1,171, of 969,800 tons, manned by 28,266 men, and 2,522 sailing vessels of 585,571 tons, manned by 14,162 sailors. Details of the increase since 1899 are lacking, only the aggregates being available. These show that in 1901 the growth of the German merchant marine has been from a total of 1,737,798 tons in 1899 to 2,966,950 tons, of which steamers have increased from 1,150,159 tons to 2,430,206 tons. Of this immense increase only 208,000 tons of German shipping has been built in British yards since 1897.

But note the contrast, assuming that all German vessels in 1870 were seagoing, while all the other figures represent seagoing tonnage:

	1870.			1898.
	Steam.	Sail.	Total.	Steam.	Sail.	Total.
Germany	81,994	900,361	982,355	969,800	585,571	1,555,371
United States	192,544	1,324,256	1,516,800	294,064	443,645	737,709
Excess of United States	110,550	423,895	534,445
Excess of Germany				675,736	141,926	817,662

And since 1898 Germany has turned out from German shipyards probably over a million tons of merchant steamships. The tonnage built in 1900 and building in 17 German yards in 1901 aggregated alone 609,884, nearly as great as the total tonnage, steam and sail, of the American fleet engaged in foreign trade to-day. It is not necessary to add more figures of German increase to those given above. They are humiliating enough to us as they stand.

Perhaps I should turn for one moment to France. France has not been as successful as Germany. I should like to tell the other side of the story and dwell upon her effort to increase her strength on the ocean and the reasons why the conditions have not been so favorable there.

THE UNITED STATES AND GERMANY COMPARED.

But when we consider the wonderful stride Germany has made in increasing her great commerce we should remember that her area is 208,725 square miles and her population 53,000,000, while the United States has an area of 3,622,933 square miles.

Mr. ELKINS. Outside of Alaska?

Mr. PERKINS. No; that includes Alaska. It does not include the Philippines, but includes Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. The United States has an area of 3,622,933 square miles, with a population, according to our last census, of 76,000,000. Our coast line, as I have stated to-day, excluding the lake line, is about 10,000 miles. Germany has, if I recollect correctly, about 500 miles of coast line. The State of California, which I have the honor to represent, in part, has a coast line of 800 miles, or 300 miles more than the whole coast of Germany.

Mr. President, consider what Germany has accomplished by these subventions. I will not say subsidies, because, as I said in the early part of my remarks, that is a harsh word and I do not like to hear it. It has been done by differential duties, by differential favors given for the purpose of building ships in Germany and operating them under the German flag and under the laws governing the maritime commerce of Germany. Germany is making such wonderful strides that it seems to me it ought to make every American blush that we have not made better progress.

THE GERMAN POLICY.

The German policy, which has done so much for the Empire, was inaugurated by Bismarck, who, in a memorial to the German Parliament, based his request for Government aid on the subsidies given by France, England, Austria, and Italy to their merchant shipping. He had, says Consul Mason—the sagacity to see that the time would soon come—had indeed come—when Germany must have new and extended foreign markets for her surplus manufactured products or languish from congestion as her productive energies overran the purchasing power of her people.

The results of his efforts were subsidies to steamship lines and bounties for constructing new vessels, which, Consul Mason states, have equaled in amount the payments for mail service. The aid given by the Government, through which the German merchant marine has grown to its present vast dimensions, has been payments under the guise of mail subsidies for the establishment of new lines and the improvement of existing service, bounties for the construction of new vessels, reduction of all possible items in the cost of materials for shipbuilding, and encouragement and honor given to it by the Imperial Government, which, says Consul Mason—

In a country like this, where royal favor is so potent and eagerly sought for, is an important element of success. * * * No capitalists or business men are more honored in Germany than those who have contributed to these results. * * * There are not lacking conservatives—mainly agrarians and social reactionaries—who have opposed this policy as they oppose the improvement in the canals and internal water routes of this country, but they do not control the policy of Germany, and, in all probability, never will.

THE EXPERIENCE OF FRANCE.

Now let us look at France. This country has not been so successful as Germany in her efforts to increase her strength on the ocean, and for the reason that the conditions surrounding shipbuilding there are entirely different from those obtaining in Germany. In France the shipyards are branches of the national arsenal, and depend on orders from the State for warships, seeing only a side profit in building merchant vessels. The laws passed to encourage the growth of the merchant marine, therefore, have not been productive of such results as are found in Germany, where the whole force and influence of the Government has been thrown to the side of the merchant vessel. Moreover, as the Marseilles Society for the Defense of Commerce has pointed out—

Great Britain has coal and iron at lower prices than France, and with its innumerable shipyards and machine shops can produce tonnage on terms with which our builders are incapable of competing. Not only are the ships supplied at lower cost, but they are supplied more promptly.

But even France can show what benefits may flow from government encouragement to the merchant marine by money payments. By the law of 1893 the provisions of that of 1881, which had not produced the benefits expected, were changed. The bounty for construction was increased, the sailing bounty for steamships reduced from 28.95 to 21.23 cents per net ton per 1,000 miles, that for sailing ships increased from 28.95 cents to 32.81 cents, vessels engaged in international coasting trade were given two-thirds the bounty allowed in oversea traffic, and the extra navigation bounty increased from 15 to 25 per cent.

The results of this law were what might be expected of it. The steam tonnage, whose bounty had been diminished, showed an increase of only 66,961 tons from 1893 to 1898, and that was confined to the subsidized lines or those lines reserved entirely to French vessels. Under the law of 1881 the tonnage of vessels taking part in foreign competition increased in 1885 from 322,000 tons to 501,000 tons, but under the law of 1893, reducing the sailing bounty, the tonnage in this trade actually diminished. But in the case of sailing vessels, whose sailing bounty was increased, there was a remarkable increase of tonnage. According to United States Consul A. M. Thackara, of Havre, under the stimulus of the increased bounty the French sailing fleet "has increased more in proportion during the last five years than the sailing fleet of almost any other nation."

THE FRENCH FLAG ON THE SEAS.

And the effects of this increase are seen in almost every part of the world. In the harbor of San Francisco, during the past six or seven years, the French flag has been seen with a frequency which has called forth remark from those who give no attention to nautical affairs. The increase of this class of French shipping forced itself upon the notice of even the least observing. And now the French Government is about to apply the same stimulus to its steam merchant marine, for it has again amended the law and will increase the sailing bounty for steamships from 21.23 cents per 1,000 miles to 32.81 cents; but with that fatuity which has marked France's efforts in this direction it will diminish its sailing bounty to sailing ships. With such backing and filling, with such inadequate adaptation of means to ends, with such disregard of plain lessons, it is no wonder that France does not make great headway in the direction in which the wise and steadfast German policy has sent its merchant marine so far. And then comes prominently forward another cause of this lack of success in the following sentences from the report of the committee on the budget of the minister of commerce:

The French yards being almost entirely absorbed by orders for naval vessels, both from the French and from foreign governments, are fatally led to make demands from private sources wait. Cheapness and quick delivery have decided our owners to buy their ships in foreign markets.

And so a bounty will be given to modern French steamers built abroad, instead of, as in Germany, reducing the items of cost of raw material for shipbuilding, that ships may be built as cheaply as in foreign yards, and then by wise payments encouraging the construction of ships at home. Under the German policy, the number of shipyards has increased to 29, while France has only 3 of any consequence, with only 1 new one projected. Yet with all the disadvantages of unwise policy and lack of facilities for construction, the seagoing merchant marine of France stands third in relative importance, Germany being second, and Great Britain first.

PAYMENT FOR CARRYING THE MAILS ONLY AN INCIDENT.

If I correctly understand the position of the junior Senator from Georgia, his objection to the bill is that it does not provide for payment on account of carrying the mails on the basis of a given sum for a certain weight per mile; that is, that the bill does not confine itself to payment for the actual expense of the steamship companies for transporting certain bags of letters and papers. I would answer that no government which gives aid to its steamship lines confines itself to the narrow limits which the Senator from Georgia would set. If Germany, England, or France had done so they would not now have upon the ocean the magnificent ships which connect those countries with all parts of the world.

The object of these payments is not simply to insure the carrying of letters and papers from one port to another, but to build up lines of steamships between home and foreign ports that will surpass in speed, accommodation, and effectiveness for general commerce the lines of foreign competitors, that the facilities extended to trade and the prestige gained by general superiority may increase the commercial prosperity of the home country. This is the object of the large payments made by foreign nations to its great steamship lines, and whenever it is apparent that the sums granted are not sufficient to insure successful competition or to afford the desired facilities for general commerce, they are increased.

I do not think that the Senator from Georgia will assert that the payments made to the North German Lloyd were solely to compensate the company for carrying the mails. Such compensation would have had little effect in building up that magnificent steamship service. It was almost exclusively to create that perfection of service as to speed, carrying capacity, accommodation, regularity, and freight charges that aid was given, with the incidental advantage of possessing a magnificent fleet for war purposes in time of need. Therefore the tonnage of mail and the cost of handling it cut absolutely no figure in the bargains made with the North German Lloyd. In the Reichstag in 1888 there was introduced a bill to improve the mail service with eastern Asia and Australia, double the service with China, and guarantee the subsidy for fifteen years. In the report accompanying the bill is the following:

Quick and well-managed regular steam communication, experience has taught, is the backbone of oversea navigation. It is indispensable to passenger and postal travel; by its speed and regularity it does most to encourage commerce in the greatest and smallest industries. The closer and greater the connection between the commerce and industries of two countries the greater the need for steam navigation. In the attainment of this necessity, Germany, with her steadily growing industries and constant increase of power among the nations, should no longer remain under the protection of alien flags, but beneath her own flag and with her own steam navigation should bring her home products to a prominent position.

On these grounds the report recommended an increase of 1,500,000 marks in the subsidy of 4,090,000 marks and a renewal of the fifteen years' contract. The mere work of carrying the mails did not figure in the case.

THE EXTENSION OF TRADE ABROAD.

The policy of Germany is further shown in a report of J. C. Monaghan, consul at Chemnitz, Germany, who says:

If coarse cottons can be spun and woven in the South; if Alabama can make iron rails as cheap or cheaper than England; if Europe buys our machines, locomotives, tools, agricultural instruments, etc., we must carry these products to the East. Chemnitz is looking forward to a time when China will wear the hose and underwear of Western people. Germany has made up her mind to carry her own products in her own ships, built in her own yards. Her example might well be followed by the United States.

This Empire neglects nothing that aids her foreign commerce. Her interest in home industries is equaled by her efforts for trade in far-off lands. A year ago a commission of experts went to the Orient to study its needs and to gather information. Subsidies have been voted to steamship companies with a view to the extension of the Empire's exports. In ten years Germany has increased the number of her large establishments in China from 56 to 92, and in Japan from 38 to 57. The exports from Germany to China went up from $5,871,500 to $10,769,500 in the years between 1889 and 1896, an increase of 86.7 per cent; to Japan the increase was from $4,426,800 to $8,490,000, or 92.2 per cent. The imports are relatively larger—from $2,023,000 to $4,760,000, or 136.5 per cent, from China, and from $833,000 to $2,142,000, or 162.7 per cent, from Japan.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is absolutely correct when he says that—

The object and purpose is not to provide steamers purely for mail purposes, fixing the compensation on just and reasonable lines in proportion to the services performed, but really to give a certain amount to shipowners for commercial purposes and to build up a certain line and class of business at the expense of the public Treasury under the cover and guise of postal services.

It is, indeed, the purpose to build up a certain line and class of business at the expense of the public Treasury—a line and class of business that will extend our commerce to all parts of the world, that will promote the sale of our agricultural products and our manufactures, that will place behind them the visible signs of the wealth, energy, and power of the United States. The carrying of mails is only an incident. It is therefore not surprising, as the Senator asserts, that the Postmaster-General was not called on to give reasons for the proposed changes. The reasons are found in the needs of our commerce, not in the necessities of the Post-Office Department.

ANOTHER MERIT OF THE BILL.

If I understand the Senator from Georgia on another point, it is that he objects to the bill because it provides a greater compensation than the bill of 1891 for similar services. In my opinion, that is one of the merits of the bill. Our experience under the bill of 1891 has demonstrated that the compensation authorized has not been sufficient to induce the establishment of new lines of communication or to permit the improvement of service on existing lines so they may keep abreast of their competitors. If we are to receive any benefit from our merchant marine it must be second to none in the facilities it offers to trade.

The American Line, established under the law of 1891, has not shown the same development that has been observed in its German and English competitors since its ships were first placed in commission. It is falling behind, and the prestige which we at first had on account of its four fine ships is fast passing to the German, the Englishman, and the Frenchman. Clearly the compensation given has not produced the same result as that given to competing lines, and for the reason that it has not been so liberal; and it has not been so liberal because the extra interest on increased cost of construction and the greater expense of maintenance on account of greater wages eat up a larger share of the receipts. And new lines have not been organized because it was seen that these items of extra expense were not fully compensated for by the payments authorized by the Government.

It has been seen in the case of France, which can not build vessels as cheaply as can be done in England, that when the sailing bounty to steamships was reduced beyond a given amount, there was no longer an increase in that class of tonnage; that when the sailing bounty for sailing ships was increased beyond a given sum, their construction was immediately promoted, that the tonnage of sailing ships increased at a rapid rate, and that the French flag was carried by magnificent square riggers to the four corners of the earth. There was, then, a margin of difference in the cost of vessels which had to compete with those most cheaply made, which in one case was not compensated for by the bounty and was in the other.

A differential payment to compensate for such difference was therefore necessary to stimulate the construction of French ships in French yards. What France did for her sailing ships we, by this bill, propose to do for our sailing and steam vessels, independently of payments for the establishment of lines of fast mail steamers, whose special services to commerce demand special recognition. These payments to ordinary steamships and sailing vessels are differential in character, as were those of France, and for the same purpose, namely, to compensate for the increased cost of construction, and in our case for the additional increased cost of maintenance.

WHY AMERICAN BUILT SHIPS COST SO MUCH.

What the United States has to contend with in our effort to place our flag again on the sea can be seen at a glance from the following tables. remembering that the principal cost of a ship is the labor expended in shaping the iron and steel and placing it in position. The rates of wages given below, obtained from consular reports and the report of the Industrial Commission, exhibit in a manner that can not be gainsaid the disadvantages under which our shipbuilders labor in striving to build a ship as cheaply as can be done by our competitors. The figures given represent the average weekly wages in the yards of the great maritime nations:

Workmen.	France, private yards.	Germany, Vulcan Works.	England, Liverpool yards.	United States, average.
Pattern makers	$10.42	$6.00	$9.60	$18.00
Riveters	9.26	4.80	8.75	12.00
Joiners	6.94	6.00	9.11	16.50
Machinists	6.53	7.50	7.29	15.00
Ship carpenters	8.68	6.00	9.48	18.00
Riggers	10.42	----------	8.75	11.00
Sheet-iron workers	8.10	5.10	9.36	15.00
Furnace men	10.42	6.00	5.59	10.80
Molders	----------	5.10	9.00	14.50
Laborers	6.00	4.20	4.20	9.00

The wage table shows conclusively why we can not construct a ship as cheaply as can Germany, France, or England, and why Germany has emancipated herself from the British shipbuilders and can send her ships to all parts of the world. The greater cost of her iron, coal, and other shipbuilding materials probably about counterbalances her advantages as to wages, while in the case of France she is at a disadvantage, which demands a general bounty of a considerable amount. In our own case we are clearly beyond the hope of competition without aid, and that aid is to be given in part to make up the increased expense of maintaining the ship incident to her greater cost.

It would seem to me to be beyond dispute or question that if we are to have a merchant marine we must compensate in some way for the greater cost of our ships, which we should do for the reason that the services rendered by a large fleet flying the American flag is national and affects every industrial interest.

WHY IT COSTS SO MUCH TO OPERATE AMERICAN SHIPS.

The additional expense of maintenance of American vessels on account of the wages of officers and seamen is as fully shown in the following table of monthly wages paid on French, German, English, and American vessels, all but the last being furnished by the United States consul at Marseilles:

	France.	Germany.	England.	United States.
Captain	$96.50	----------	----------	----------
First mate	57.90	$35.70	$53.53	$120.00
Second mate	34.74	23.80	38.93	70.00
First engineer	77.20	89.25	63.26	150.00
Second engineer	48.25	52.36	48.66	100.00
Third engineer	38.60	33.32	38.93	85.00
Steward	24.12	14.28	30.00	62.50
Fireman	23.16	16.66	18.24	40.00
Seaman	12.54	16.66	17.02	25.00
Coal passer	14.47	15.47	14.59	30.00

The above shows as conclusively as the former table why a differential payment should be made to American shipowners. It proves the contention of the supporters of this bill that the wages paid to American workmen are responsible for our inability to compete with foreign nations on the sea without Government aid. Were it merely to permit American capitalists to make money by investing in ships to sail under our flag, I should oppose this or any other bill of similar import. Were it simply to facilitate the carrying of mails in American vessels, I should likewise oppose it. These two results of the bill are, however, merely incidental.

The great object, the end which overshadows all and makes puerile opposition on the score of rendering it possible to secure profits in a business which now yields none, of making payments for carrying mail out of proportion to the actual cost of the work, is the extension of American commerce to all parts of the world. What an extension of commerce means is, I think, plain to all. It is simply a means for increasing the demands for our products. If we have chances to sell more than we now do we shall be so much the better off. It is business expansion that is aimed at. It is to create markets for all we can possibly produce, without danger of glutting the home market by overproduction.

A SAFETY-VALVE FOR OUR PRODUCTIVE INDUSTRIES.

It is to create a safety valve for business which will prevent disaster when domestic industrial conditions change. It is one of the greatest results of Germany's policy of aiding its merchant marine that during the period of overproduction through which it is now passing the foreign markets opened up through its munificent aid to its merchant vessels have prevented an economic convulsion that would have worked wide havoc. Our industrial conditions are to-day all that could be wished for, but we can not forever absorb the products of that restless energy that is characteristic of America. Our home markets will be more than supplied by first one product and then another, and at last we shall have competition from abroad in the very fields that are now our own. Our only safety will then be a market beyond our borders controlled by Americans through a merchant fleet on the ocean flying the American flag.

Mr. President, during the speech of the Senator from Arkansas I made notes with the intention of answering some of his points in regard to constitutional privileges and other matters in this bill, but I shall leave that to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who is to answer the Senator from Arkansas in the morning.

I wish, however, to say a few words about the deep-sea fisheries, and then I shall conclude my remarks. Senators on the other side have said that the provision as to the deep-sea fisheries was a subsidy. My friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is very fond of fishing, but he will not get any benefit under this bill, because it applies only to deep-water fishermen. [Laughter.]

THE DEEP-SEA FISHERIES.

In justice to my friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is unfortunately absent, I feel that I ought to say a word or two further before closing. It was charged that the Senator from Maine was advocating the provision for deep-sea fisheries in behalf of New England alone. Be that as it may, if he did so, it was a commendable act on his part, for if he was not faithful to his own he would be condemned by the good book, which says:

But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

Mr. President, under this bill half of those who are engaged in the deep-sea fisheries who are to receive its benefits must be American citizens and engaged for there months in the year in the service, for which there is to be paid $1 per ton on the vessel and $1 to each fisherman so engaged. It is estimated that in the aggregate it will amount to about $175,000 a year.

Canada pays an annual subsidy of $160,000 to her fishermen on the coast of Nova Scotia, distributed in accordance with the plan of that government, and other special privileges are also given to them. I think the provision in regard to the deep-sea fisheries in this bill is a very wise one for many reasons. First, it assists in bringing to the market a cheap food, for fish is certainly not only a brain food, but it is a food that is both palatable and nutritious, one that invigorates and fortifies us all physically.

To secure cheaper articles of food for the people the Government is spending millions and tens of millions of dollars annually for the improvement of agriculture by experimental stations. Congress has carried out this policy in establishing fish-cultural stations in every State in this Union. There are 25,000 or more sailors engaged in the fisheries. They will man our merchant marine and afford most valuable material for our Navy. In the early wars of this country the fishermen of New England in the end made the best sailors. I should like to enlarge upon this subject, but I shall not trespass upon the patience of the Senate.

Last year we expended for the fish hatcheries in this country $553,620, as will be seen by the table which I ask to have inserted in my remarks.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, only a week ago my friend from Arkansas introduced a bill, which passed the Senate, appropriating $25,000 for the establishment of a fish hatchery in his State. He found no objection to that, although it will cost the Government probably $10,000 more to complete it, and then several thousand dollars additional each year to support it. I voted for the measure; I thought it a wise and beneficent one; but I want to say, in passing, that somehow or other our friend seems color-blind when he comes to measures which do not seem to benefit his State or come directly home to his own people.

Mr. President, I want to repeat again and again as to the general provisions of this bill that I believe they are wise and patriotic. I believe that we have profited not only by the experience of the past fifty years, but by the act of 1891, which was framed by the author of the pending bill. I believe that the objectionable features which were contained in the bill that was before us for consideration at the last session have all been eliminated. I have no question but that this bill will result in adding to the general welfare and prosperity of our country. Not only will it result in benefit to the seaboard, but I believe every industry in our country will be benefited by it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 13, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, our Father, whose ways are past finding out, yet whose presence manifests itself in a thousand displays of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness day by day, illustrating our utter dependence upon Thee for life and all its blessings, who can understand the mystic ties of love and affection which bind us together into families, communities, and nationalities, so that when death comes and takes away we are shocked, overwhelmed, cast down with grief and sorrow; but we thank Thee for that faith which, like an angel, comes whispering—

Be still, sad heart, and cease repining,
For behind the clouds is the sun still shining.

Once more Thou hast touched one of the Congressional family and taken him from our midst, and we are left to wonder and mourn. Help us to be ready for the summons which must come to all. Comfort us in our sorrows, and especially be very near to the widow and orphans left desolate and grief stricken. May time, with its softening hand, assuage the grief and fill their hearts with hope and comfort and the faith expressed in the lines—

I long for household voices gone,
For vanished smiles I long,
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

So comfort and bless us all in the name of Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if this Senate amendment reduces the pension as it was allowed in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SULLOWAY. It does.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. From $40 to $30?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If I understood correctly, the preceding bills in which we have concurred in the Senate amendments each reduce the amount appropriated by the House.

Mr. SULLOWAY. They do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to follow this example set by the Senate and reduce this also in the interest of economy?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not, because this bill ought to have been fixed at the rate of $50 on the evidence, for that is the amount that the man is entitled to. The others were reduced under a rule which the Senate has.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Your motion is to nonconcur and ask for a conference?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CALDERHEAD, Mr. RUMPLE, and Mr. NORTON.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3848. An act granting a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to certain land in the city of Newport, R. I.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3182. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Louise Worden—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 4346. An act granting a pension to Augusta Turner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4021. An act granting a pension to Sarah Frances Taft—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3650. An act granting a pension to Sarah A. Carter—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4086. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Foster—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2006. An act granting an increase of pension to James Lehew—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1924. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas Feneran—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1982. An act granting an increase of pension to Eugene J. Oulman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 142. An act granting a pension to J. J. Groff—to the Committee on Pensions.

PENSION BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House bills of the following titles; which were respectively taken up, the amendments of the Senate read, and, on motion of Mr. BROMWELL, concurred in:

A bill (H. R. 3515) granting a pension to Mary A. House;

A bill (H. R. 428) granting a pension to Sarah Bowers; and

A bill (H. R. 8493) granting a pension to Harry H. Sieg.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CASSEL, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. BELMONT, for ten days additional, on account of illness.

MAHLON C. MOORES.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I desire to call up a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read or only the statement of the House conferees?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I presume the statement will be sufficient.

There being no objection, the reading of the conference report, which is as follows, was dispensed with:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 8541, "An act granting an increase of pension to Mahlon C. Moores," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
S. W. SMITH,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The result of the conference on H. R. 8541, "Granting an increase of pension to Mahlon C. Moores," is that the Senate conferees recommend that the Senate recede from its amendment. The bill passed the House of Representatives at $40 per month, but was amended in the Senate to $25 per month. The effect of the adoption of the report of the conferees would be to grant to Mahlon C. Moores a pension of $40 per month, as originally passed by the House.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
S. W. SMITH,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and pending that motion, I desire to see whether we can not reach an agreement touching the closing of general debate.

Mr. JENKINS. Can the gentleman give me twenty minutes?

Mr. LOUD. I can not make any agreement as to the disposition of the time until the House has disposed of the matter. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill may close in two hours, one hour on each side, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will this order interfere with the list of speakers which the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has been following?

The SPEAKER. The presiding officer of the House knows nothing about "the list" which may be in the possession of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole; that is merely an informal memorandum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to inquire whether the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. LOUD] intends that the two hours shall be devoted solely to the discussion of the subsidy proposition contained in the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California can not control that question. Under the rules and practice regulating general debate, the subject to be discussed is under the control of the gentleman occupying the floor, subject only to the requirement that the remarks be parliamentary. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from California?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I object.

Mr. LOUD. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate close in three hours, under the same conditions I have just stated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. JENKINS. I object.

Mr. LOUD. Then I will move that general debate on this bill close in two hours, the time to be controlled as already suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the Post-Office appropriation bill be limited to two hours. The other part of his motion is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did the objection to the request of the gentleman from California, that general debate be limited to three hours, come from this side of the House or the other? My attention was diverted at the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] objected.

Mr. JENKINS. I am perfectly willing to withdraw my objection for the purpose of asking the gentleman from California if he will give me twenty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If three hours be allowed, can not the gentleman from Wisconsin have twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York twenty?

Mr. LOUD. I will be perfectly frank and say that such time as I may control I shall yield to gentlemen who desire to discuss this bill. If there is any time left, I will say that I should yield it to the gentlemen who desire to discuss some other subjects.

Mr. JENKINS. Then I renew my objection.

Mr. LOUD. I will change my motion to close debate to three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the general debate on this subject be limited to three hours.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from California, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, H. R. 11354.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, H. R. 11354, with Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

Mr. CRUMPACKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, H. R. 11354, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has the floor.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. My understanding was that the time was to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that any agreement as to the control of time is subject to the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Well, that was included in the motion that I made. I did not repeat exactly the words, but I made the motion to close the debate in three hours, under the same condition proposed before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the Speaker to hold that he could not include in the motion the condition that the time was to be controlled by the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Tennessee. The Chair will take the instruction of the committee upon the control of the time.

Mr. LOUD. If that is so, I will say that my motion would have been different. I understood that the Speaker held that way. I will now ask unanimous consent that the time may be divided in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time now to be occupied shall be controlled in equal parts by the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. LOUD. I reserve my time, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from Tennessee yields thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Tennessee be kind enough to furnish the Chair with the division of control upon which they agree?

Mr. LOUD. Just as soon as we can, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall direct the remarks that I have to make upon this bill to that paragraph making an appropriation for special railway mail facilities upon the line between the city of Washington and the city of New Orleans, by way of Atlanta. There are 2,746 railway mail routes in the United States, aggregating over 183,000 miles, and the expense to the Government of transporting mails by means of railways amounts to nearly $34,000,000 a year.

There are over 183,000 miles of railroad carrying mail, running into all parts of the country, ramifying every town and hamlet, and constituting a splendid, a magnificent, system for the diffusion of intelligence which is the just pride of every citizen of the country, and no man can have any just ground of objection to necessary appropriations for its proper maintenance. The enormous sum appropriated, in the main, is judiciously expended. The maximum pay for the carriage of mails by railways is fixed by positive statutes, and I understand that in making contracts the maximum amount is always paid.

The average expense for carrying mails by rail in the United States is a little above $184 per mile per annum. Out of the 2,746 railway mail routes all excepting half a dozen lines carry the mails for the regular statutory pay. A number of years ago special-facility appropriations were made, in addition to the regular pay, for the purpose of expediting the mails between important commercial centers. These special appropriations were afterwards gradually withdrawn by the Post-Office Department, and by action of Congress, without in the slightest degree affecting or impairing the efficiency of the splendid railroad-carrying service.

In 1877 special appropriations were made for the expedition of mails from New York and New England along the Atlantic coast line to Tampa, Fla., with a view of accelerating the foreign mail into the West Indies. That run on for a few years and was finally withdrawn, and the result was that the efficiency of the mail carriage from New York and New England to the West Indies by way of Tampa did not suffer in the remotest degree.

The same service precisely, continued after the discontinuance of the special appropriation as existed before, but when that appropriation was withdrawn from the Atlantic Coast Line, Congress in its wisdom vested in the Postmaster-General power to expend about $170,000 a year toward the expedition of a line of mail from the city of New York, by way of Washington and Atlanta, to the city of New Orleans, and every year from that time to the present a special appropriation for that line has been made.

I am prepared to demonstrate to every fair and candid mind in this House that if there was ever any justification for that subsidy the time has long since past, and that it can be withheld now without in the slightest measure affecting the efficacy of the mail service between New York and New England and points in the South and Southwest.

In former Post-Office appropriation bills—from 1893 to the present bill—appropriations amounting to about $27,000 a year were given to the Pennsylvania Company as additional pay for expediting the mails from the city of New York to the city of Washington, with the view of making connections with through lines over the Southern and other railroads to New Orleans.

It has all along been the understanding of Congress and the understanding of the country that for that extra $27,000 an additional train was put on, a fast train between the city of New York and the city of Washington; but an investigation of the facts has shown that the Pennsylvania Company did not add a new train nor a single car to its service between those points. It did not even change its schedules, but continued to run trains and carry mails after it received the subsidy in precisely the same manner that it did prior to the granting of the extra pay.

There is no question, Mr. Chairman, but that that appropriation was a subsidy, a gratuity pure and simple, for which the people of the United States did not receive one single farthing's benefit in return.

The Pennsylvania Railroad from New York to Washington is paid more for carrying mails than any other line of equal length in the United States. It receives regular pay, under the statute, to the amount of over $3,400 per mile per year.

As I said in the beginning of my remarks, the average of statutory pay for all the railroad routes throughout the United States is $184 per mile per year, but this line of road from New York to Washington, receiving $3,400 a mile in regular pay, was voted a bonus nine years ago of $28,000 a year and has been receiving it ever since; and I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that it has not yielded one single farthing's benefit to the country in consideration of that appropriation.

The subsidy has been voted upon the statement made on the floor of the House that the Pennsylvania company had put on an extra train, leaving the city of New York at 4.30 o'clock in the morning with the view of expediting the mail to the city of Washington, when in fact no such train was ever put into service. Not an additional car was added to the mail service on that line, and not an additional facility was made.

Conditions became so rank respecting that appropriation that they seemed to be developing into a small-sized scandal, and this year the committee have omitted the special appropriation altogether, but I understand that a motion is to be made in the House to restore it when the times comes to offer amendments to the bill.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. Has not the proviso contained at the top of page 23 in the present bill always been contained in the prior bills relating to this appropriation, under which the sum is only to be expended in case the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service? In other words, has not the entire discretion in this matter been thrown upon the Postmaster-General to determine whether or not it was necessary?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is now the same attempt to vest in the discretion of the Postmaster-General the power to expend this special appropriation that has always been connected with the appropriation; but the Post-Office Department has explained time and again to the Post-Office Committee and to Congress that since the Department has refused to recommend or to make estimates for the appropriation, that since it has declared repeatedly that the public did not receive a fair equivalent for the outlay, and that it ought to be discontinued, the persistent voting of the money by Congress and the conferring of power upon the Post-Office Department to expend it was considered to be equivalent to a direction, and they have continued to expend it under that proviso and will continue to do so until doomsday.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads know the interpretation the Department puts upon that proviso. The House has been informed repeatedly of the interpretation the Department puts upon the proviso and why it is done. We all know that the Department will construe the appropriation as a direction to expend it as long as it is made.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad have indicated their perfect willingness that this appropriation, which has heretofore been given, or that portion of the appropriation which has heretofore been given to the Pennsylvania Railroad, may be omitted this year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understood that such willingness had been expressed, although I have not heard it definitely, but I do not wonder at it. Why should it not? Is there a man in this committee who can for a single moment justify that appropriation, when he knows that not an iota of benefit has been afforded to the people of the country from its expenditure?

In the arguments upon this question in times past I have heard gentlemen in support of these appropriations stand and insist that a new train was put in the service from New York to Washington and that that justified Congress in authorizing the payment. If that was the impression or the understanding of members, Congress has been acting in the dark; has been making the appropriation upon a misunderstanding of the facts.

I am not surprised that officers of the Pennsylvania Company should come to the committee and willingly yield any claim upon the appropriation. What right have they to it? They have gotten near a quarter of a million dollars of a bonus in the last nine years. I repeat, it is the heaviest-paid mail line in the United States and yields absolutely no return for this special pay.

Now, when the special appropriation was first made for the purpose of expediting mails between the city of Washington and New Orleans by way of Atlanta an additional fast mail train was added to the line. There had been one train making fast time from New York to New Orleans by way of Washington and Atlanta over the lines benefited by the special appropriation.

In 1892 or 1893 the Southern Railroad and its southern and southwestern connections converted a local train into a fast train, and later on put on a new train to accommodate local traffic. The new fast train was put in this service in consideration of the subsidy of $140,000 a year, which the line is still drawing.

If there was any justification for this special appropriation in the first place, it can be demonstrated that the reason has ceased to exist. When the appropriation was first made, in 1893, the total pay of this line of railroad for carrying mail from Washington to New Orleans was about $382,000 a year. That was the regular pay. It amounted to $335 a mile—$1,051 a day.

The pay of this same line for 1901—the regular pay, the statutory pay—exclusive of the bonus, amounted to $795,866—$700 a mile for the year—not including what is known as the railway post-office pay. The regular statutory compensation this line of railroad receives from the Government for the transportation of mails from the city of Washington to the city of New Orleans has increased since the special appropriation began over 107 per cent. It receives now, in the way of regular pay, exclusive of the subsidy, $271,000 a year more than it received in 1893, in the form of regular pay and subsidy combined.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this line could institute and maintain two fast trains between the city of Washington and New Orleans in 1893, for the sum of $524,000 a year of regular pay and subsidy, it can maintain the same two trains now for the regular pay of $795,000 a year without the subsidy. I desire to impress upon the minds of gentlemen composing this committee the important, the significant fact that the regular pay of this line now amounts to $271,000 a year more than the regular pay and subsidy combined amounted to when the special appropriation was first made.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, that the increase in the mail carriers' pay on the road between Washington and New Orleans is a fair index of the increase in business in general on that line—the increase in freight, passengers, and express business. Is there a man within the sound of my voice who will contend that this line of railroad can afford to withdraw one of those fast trains if it did not receive the subsidy? Why, the necessities of its business demand them both.

Contemplate for a moment the splendid increase of business that has gone on throughout the United States during the last nine or ten years; the magnificent improvements that have been made in railroad transportation in all of its phases. Great improvements have been made in methods of railroading, and the genius of consolidation in transportation matters is such that magnificent systems have been organized and splendidly equipped trains are dispatched throughout the country upon the fastest time possible, carrying mails for the statutory pay. The line from Washington to New Orleans is one of the most important in the United States, and it can well afford to do what other roads are doing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the time has not come to cut off this subsidy, this gratuity—for it is nothing else—when, let me ask, will that time arrive? The Postmaster-General has year after year recommended that it be discontinued. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General says that it is an injury to the railway mail-carriage service throughout the country. He says it can be discontinued without impairing the efficiency of the mail-carriage service between Washington and the great city of New Orleans.

The Postal Commission which was appointed by action of Congress a few years ago to investigate the whole question of railroad-carriage service reported in favor of the discontinuance of the subsidy. Let me ask again, in view of the fact of the enormous increase of business, the enormous increase in the receipts of this system of railroads from the Government for the carriage of mail, in view of the fact that the Post-Office Department says it is a positive injury to the railroad-carriage system of the country, in view of the recommendation of the Postal Commission that it be discontinued, what justification is there, Mr. Chairman, for Congress persisting year after year in making this gift?

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. We have tried for several years to pass a bill in this House, known as the Loud bill, controlling the violation of the law in regard to second-class matter. Year after year we have failed to pass that bill, but at last we have found a Third Assistant Postmaster-General who has the nerve and the courage to enforce the law and make it unnecessary for us to attempt to legislate further on that subject. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, if the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had a little of the nerve of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, this subsidy would not have been cut off years ago?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I presume so——

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me answer the gentleman from Ohio first. I presume so, and yet it is a very natural position for the Post-Office Department to take, when Congress knows of the interpretation it puts on the provision—to construe it to mean a mandate to expend it as it has in years past.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is it any more so than when we, in attempting to prevent a violation of the law in regard to second-class mail matter year after year, refused to pass the Loud bill, and yet the Third Assistant takes upon himself the responsibility to do it?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Perhaps not; but the question is up to Congress now, and I am endeavoring to illustrate the fact that there is absolutely no justification on the part of Congress to make the appropriation when we know that the Post-Office Department will expend it in the face of these adverse recommendations as long as we appropriate the money.

Mr. BROMWELL. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FLEMING. In the question put by the gentleman from Ohio, does he not place the responsibility on the wrong man? Is it not the Postmaster-General himself who is responsible for the conduct of his office?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think it is, but I think the responsibility is primarily located on Congress and Congress can not escape it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rejoice that the distinguished lawyer, the gentleman from Indiana, is addressing the House on this question. I want to ask him, as a lawyer, is it not now and has it not always been a direct perversion of the statute appropriating this subsidy for the Postmaster-General, or his subordinate, to declare that it is mandatory and not a matter of discretion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a question, perhaps, of ethics with the Department, which I have not the time to discuss. Mr. Chairman, the only conceivable benefit that has been received for this appropriation from Washington to New Orleans of late years is the claim that it is a stimulus to fast trains to make the schedule time. It has been said that the Post-Office Department fixes the schedule for the trains. That is a mistake.

The Post-Office Department has nothing to do whatever in establishing the schedules. They are established by the railroad to accommodate its own business. They are established with a view of making important connections that will contribute to the benefit of the railroad company, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says when the railroads have established their schedules the Post-Office Department simply approves them. They are established, first, to subserve the convenience and meet the requirements of the passenger and express business of the line of railroad between Washington and New Orleans, and when they have once been established they can not be changed without the consent of the Postmaster-General.

Now, it is said that if any one of these fast trains fails to make its schedule time at junctional points it is fined. Fined how? The Postmaster-General does not pay that train its subsidy for that particular trip. That is all. It gets its regular pay; it gets the same pay that every other railroad in the United States that is carrying the mails gets and is glad to transport the mails for.

This road that is receiving per mile per annum over three times as much as the average pay of all the railroads throughout the United States continues to receive its regular pay, and if it fails to make schedule time at some important connection the Post-Office Department withholds the subsidy only for that particular train on that particular day. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General testified before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that the system of fines and forfeitures once existed to stimulate railroads to make schedule time with mail trains, but, he said, the demands of the public had become such that it was a good safeguard against unnecessary delays of mail trains and the fines and forfeitures had become obsolete.

It might be that we could spend $10,000,000 a year in bonuses to be paid to railroads as a reward for making their schedules. It might result in some slight benefit, but the outlay would be altogether out of proportion to the results. There would be no fair equivalent for the expenditure.

But this subsidy is an invidious discrimination against other railroads, and breeds jealousy and discontent. Other roads carry the mails as expeditiously as this particular line, for the regular statutory pay. We are getting just as efficient service from other lines without any subsidy. Why should we pay this line this bonus of $142,000 a year, when the returns from the expenditure are not a fair equivalent?

I make the assertion that no one can investigate the facts in connection with this appropriation and its history for the last nine years without coming to the conclusion that the appropriation can be withheld now without impairing in any degree the efficiency of the service. Every train that is run now under the stimulus of this bonus will continue to be run.

Every schedule that is maintained now will be continued, because the enormous passenger and express business of this important trunk line connecting New England with the South, the Southwest, Texas, and the Pacific coast, over the Southern Pacific—the exigencies of this great business peremptorily require that this line furnish the same accommodations between the great centers of commerce that competing lines furnish.

The Louisville and Nashville road, running from Cincinnati to New Orleans, runs two trains a day between those points, making substantially the same time as the subsidized trains, and it is done on the regular mail pay. The Illinois Central road, running from Chicago to New Orleans, runs two, and I do not know but more, trains a day on the same time as the subsidized trains are run over the Southern and its connecting lines, and this is done for the regular pay, which is regarded by the country as ample. All trunk lines are compelled by the demands of the public to maintain fast trains and the best accommodations. It has come to be a public necessity and subsidies are not demanded for its continuance.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LOUD. I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to one hour, for thirty minutes of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in this debate it has been customary for a number of years for those who are opposed to this proposition to assail it as a "subsidy," thinking, I suppose, that it may prejudice the minds of some people against the proposition, because it is claimed to be a "subsidy." Well, so far as I am individually concerned, it is a matter of no concern to me whether gentlemen designate this appropriation as a "subsidy" or as pay for special facilities. As a matter of fact, we all know that it is not a subsidy. A subsidy is something paid by the Government to individuals to aid in their individual transactions. The Government pays railroad companies and other persons for carrying the United States mail and for conducting the Government business; and the only question involved in this case is whether the Government is paying more to these railroad companies for doing this particular mail service than it ought to pay.

It is proposed in this bill to pay to the railroads carrying mails from the city of Washington, via Atlanta, to the city of New Orleans $142,000, for special facilities put on by those companies. Now, the question is whether it is wise for the Government to spend this money for that purpose, and whether the people of the United States or a portion of them receive any adequate return for the money expended. That is all there is in the question.

There is no disputing the fact that before this special pay was granted by the Government of the United States for these special facilities the mail in reaching the Southern post-offices was from an hour to twelve hours later than it is now. The record shows that. This subject has been thrashed over here for many years, and that proposition has never been disputed. Any man living along the line of the route knows that before 1893, when this special pay was granted, the mail was delivered many hours later than it is now.

Mr. SIMS. Allow me one moment. As I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], he said that the portion of this subsidy heretofore paid to the Pennsylvania Railroad has dropped out of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman know why that has been done?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand from a gentleman connected with the road that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was not willing to allow the Government any longer to control the schedule of these two trains for $28,000 a year. It preferred to have the management of its own trains rather than receive this pay.

Mr. SIMS. That being the case, will not the entire scheme fail by the Pennsylvania not keeping up its part of the special facilities?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; because the Post-Office Department can order this train running from Washington to Atlanta to wait here for the New York mail, even if it is slow coming from New York, and when it gathers up that mail it leaves when the Post-Office Department directs it shall leave.

Mr. SIMS. In fact, will not the Pennsylvania portion failing relatively affect it all along the line?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, it may delay it a few minutes. The time of the train running from here to New York is only five hours and it is twenty-four hours from here to Birmingham and nearly thirty-six hours from here to New Orleans.

Mr. SIMS. My recollection, however, is that it has always been stated that one of the chief objects in giving these special facilities was to get the New York and Eastern mail that much earlier, and if one of the main links drops out——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, the Pennsylvania Railroad is not going to quit carrying the Government mail. It may not carry it quite as rapidly as it did before. I do not know whether it will or not, but it will deliver it here and these trains can be held to take it up when it comes. Now, if the gentleman wants to argue his case, I prefer to have him argue it in his own time. I am willing to answer questions.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it is an argument. Has the subsidy given to those roads south of Washington been decreased any by reason of this additional slowness, we will call it, of the Pennsylvania trains?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The special pay to the Pennsylvania Railroad is cut off. The amount of pay to the other railroads is not cut off, because they render the same services to-day, and will continue to render them, that they have rendered in years past, and there is no reason to cut it off, if they are going to be paid for special facilities at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does he not know that the Pennsylvania Company run the same trains on the same schedule time between New York and Washington for years before this special facility was granted that it has been running since?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would state to the gentleman candidly that I am not familiar with the schedule times of the Pennsylvania trains and never have been. I do not know what the schedules were and the times of trains from Washington south before this was put on and what they are now; but as to the schedules of the Pennsylvania Railroad bringing the mail in here I do not know. I have always heard it claimed on the floor that the reason the Pennsylvania Railroad asked for this additional pay was that it started a train out of New York at 4 o'clock in the morning, when it could not do much passenger business, but now as to that part of the line I do not know and I am not prepared to speak. I am merely addressing myself to the necessity of keeping this special pay on for the roads from Washington south.

Mr. FLEMING. May I ask the gentleman a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, yes; but I have only a few minutes left, and I do not like to spend all of my time in answering questions.

Mr. FLEMING. I understood the gentleman to say that the railroad officials gave as the reason for surrendering this $28,000 pay that they wished to control the schedule of their trains. Does the gentleman mean to say that the surrender of that subsidy gives them any more or less control over the schedule than with the subsidy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly.

Mr. FLEMING. Why, undoubtedly not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FLEMING. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They were required to have their trains that carried this mail leave New York at a time fixed by the Department and they were required to leave at a time fixed by the Department. They are not now required to do so when they no longer receive this special pay. I beg to say, if the gentleman wants to argue the case, that is what has been stated to me and what I believe, and if the gentleman has other information I will ask him to state it in his own time.

Mr. FLEMING. The withholding of the special pay has nothing whatever to do with control over the schedule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia. I will state that I believe to the contrary. Now, there is nothing new in this question. When the Government first began carrying mail by railroad, additional pay was given to many railroads for quick service. It was paid all over the Northern States, but the reason for appropriating money for the roads that run through the States of the North to-day is that since the Railway Mail Service grew up special cars are put on by the railways for the clerks in the Railway Mail Service, where they can run out from New York to Chicago or from New York to Boston, out of the great cities, and the mail trains practically carry nothing but mail cars. These roads are paid a rental for those cars, and that rental operates as a special pay for the running of those trains; and they can be run without local stops—without stopping for local passengers—but run as mail trains and receive the additional pay by reason of the rental of their cars.

Therefore in the thickly settled portions of the country they can afford to run these great trains carrying nothing except mail without a special appropriation such as we have here, because they get their returns in the rental of the cars, but on the Southern roads, where the population is sparse, where they can not afford to run a full mail train, they have to carry the mail on a passenger train. They have to connect their mail car with a train carrying passengers and that does some passenger business. Now, if you want to stop at every station to pick up passengers, you can not make fast time. If you are not going to stop at the local stations to pick up passengers, then it is going to affect the compensation of the railroad running the train, and the railroad is entitled so some additional pay for the loss of the passenger service. That is all there is in that particular proposition.

As a matter of fact, before this special pay was granted the Southern Railroad ran out of the city of Washington to New Orleans two mail trains a day, but there was a difference of some twelve hours in the running time between Washington and New Orleans, and a difference of four or five hours in reaching Atlanta, the time being that much longer than it is now. Why did that occur? Because those two trains did local passenger business. They stopped at the local stations and picked up the local passengers and carried them on to their destination.

Since the Government has taken control of these two trains, No. 35 and No. 37, on the Southern Railroad, the railroad has been compelled to put on four trains instead of two. Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] asks, Do you suppose that the Southern Railroad is going to take off those two passenger trains if you do not grant these special facilities? No, but they will take off the trains that are doing the local business and allow the two through trains to do the local business. Therefore, it will drop back to the old schedule, because when they stop at the small stations to pick up the local passengers they must necessarily take more time in reaching their destination than when they run through.

Train No. 37, that leaves Washington with the mail in the morning for the South, leaves here at 11.15 a. m., and does not stop at all between Washington and Charlottesville. From Charlottesville it runs through to Lynchburg, and then to Danville, and then to Charlotte, and then, with only a few stops, on down to Atlanta. Now, there are a number of small towns in between those stations. It is necessary for them to take care of that passenger business, and how do they do it? Why, they start a local train out of here at 8 o'clock in the morning that runs ahead of the fast train and picks up the passengers and carries them down to Charlotte, and at Charlotte, if they are through passengers, they are transferred to the through train. The through train leaving here at 11.15 catches the local train at Charlotte when it reaches there.

The railroad companies can not run two trains at the same cost at which they can run one. The gentleman says that the amount of mail that they have carried has greatly increased since this appropriation was originally made. Well, I have no doubt it has, but they have got to carry more cars. What has been the result? They have had to put on an extra night train carrying this mail out of here a half an hour before the regular night passenger train goes through, and they are running two trains carrying that mail now instead of one. That costs them more. The mail has increased and probably they are making some more profits, but the expenditure is a great deal more running the two trains to carry the mail at night, as well as in the day, than it was before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If subsidizing one of these trains makes it go faster and get to New Orleans sooner, how is it that it was demonstrated in the hearings in the last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress that the unsubsidized train got to New Orleans in just one minute longer time than the subsidized train?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have attempted to explain. This time was not made by either of these trains before this subsidy was granted. Both of these trains, No. 35 leaving at night and 37 leaving in the morning, are controlled by the Southern Railroad.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But it took the unsubsidized train just one minute longer than the subsidized train to run to New Orleans.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman desires to call it a subsidy, I have no objection to what he calls it. The special pay for these facilities is paid to train No. 37, while the Government controls the time of both 37 and 35.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you mean to say that it controls both the subsidized and the unsubsidized train?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the Postmaster-General says here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the use of having a subsidy at all if the unsubsidized train is also under control of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I tried to explain, train No. 37 catches the morning mail from New York and takes it down South on a schedule fast enough so that it can deliver the mail in the southern towns during business hours, instead of delivering it late at night when business is over, making the real time of the mails twelve to twenty-four hours longer for the business men of that portion of the country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the subsidy make the train run in the day time instead of in the night?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry the gentleman could not understand the explanation I have made.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not understand the explanation the gentleman has made, and it is the first time I have ever known the distinguished gentleman to fail to explain any subject that he undertook to explain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose the gentleman was out when I explained it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I have heard everything that was said by the gentleman, I think.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That train is run out of here by the Government at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does is not run at night, too?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course it runs at night before it gets to New Orleans, because it takes about twenty-four hours to get there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course it does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that train leaving here in the morning gets to Birmingham at 12 o'clock in the day, and it used to get there at 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, after the day's work was done, and it saves a day's business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One more question and then I am done. Is this provision about paying the subsidy to this railroad or any of these railroads, so far as that is concerned, made mandatory, or is it discretionary with the Post-Office Department?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman is able to read the provision in the bill as well as I am, and I will leave it to his own construction. The bill provides that no "part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the Post-Office Department not held that to be mandatory?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether the Postmaster-General has held it to be mandatory or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I say to the gentleman that he has done so, and so stated in hearings before the Postal Committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Indiana claimed that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is in the testimony, and I have read the whole of it, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to put it in the RECORD, but I will ask him to allow me to proceed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is in the hearings. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, if he is not willing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be glad if the gentleman would not, as I would be glad to continue what I have to say.

Mr. Chairman, it does not make any difference to me whether it is mandatory or not mandatory. I say we have discussed this question before in the House long enough, and we know enough about it to know whether we think this special pay ought to be granted for this special service or not. We are just as capable of coming to a conclusion about that matter as the Postmaster-General. We have discussed it for years here, and if the members of the House think the people along the Southern Railway are not entitled to these additional facilities in the carrying of the mail and giving it to them many hours ahead of the old schedule time, and not willing to pay this $142,000 to grant them that privilege, then they can vote against it. As for myself, I want my people and the people along the line of this railroad to get the benefit of this quick mail delivery; and for that reason I intend to vote for the appropriation and endeavor to facilitate the Southern mails.

Now, I want to say that the Post-Office Department has prescribed the schedules for train No. 35, which leaves at night at 10 o'clock, and No. 37, which leaves in the morning at 11 o'clock, and holds the Southern Railroad to a strict adherence to the schedules of these two trains as fixed for this special facility in delivering the mail. In case the morning train arrives at Danville five minutes or more late, the Department will deduct the special facility pay, amounting to $40.79; if the same train continues on down the road and arrives at Charlotte more than five minutes late on the schedule time, the Department deducts $24.31 more for that day, and if it continues and goes on down the road to Atlanta and arrives there five minutes late, it deducts $40.78 for that day. In other words, if this train that leaves in the morning arrives at Danville, at Charlotte, and at Atlanta, all three places, five minutes late, it has forfeited its special pay for that day's run and can not get it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has the gentleman got the figures to show what proportion of the time it is late?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not got the figures, but I know that it has forfeited a considerable portion of this special facility pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman the question, because from my experience in traveling over that road it so often happens to be an hour or an hour and a half late that I supposed it forfeited about all the pay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that it has forfeited a great portion of this special pay to the Government because of its being late; and after it is forfeited the railroad has repeatedly put in claims and excuses for being late, and asked that this be not deducted, but in not one single instance since this special pay was granted, I am informed, have the Department ever taken any excuse and allowed them the pay when they did not live up to the schedule; and Mr. Shallenberger states that in his report.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Is the gentleman able to state whether they forfeited that pay when it was profitable to them or when they would consider that it was profitable to them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not suppose my friend thinks a railroad company wants intentionally to run its trains behind time. It is, of course, more profitable, as the gentleman knows, for the train to meet its connections. The gentleman knows that when it misses its connections it disturbs the business on the line, and the trains have to go to the side tracks, which costs the railroad company a great deal of money. So I hardly presume there is anything to be made by a railroad missing its schedule time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is practically all that I have to say in reference to this matter. I believe that if you cut off this special appropriation for these special facilities that the Southern Railroad will not cut off trains 37 and 25, that are the two mail trains, but they will cut off the local trains that run in conjunction with those two trains; that they will make those two through trains do the local passenger business, and arrive at their points of destination from four to twelve hours later than they do now. That would be good business judgment. These other trains can do that by running a slower schedule; they can work the local points, and they would not lose any passenger traffic by doing it, because the passengers that have to come up and down that road have to travel it anyhow. It is not paralleled by any other road close enough to take away its passenger traffic, and it is simply common business sense and judgment to believe if they could work their local points with the through trains, that they would do it, and relieve themselves of the necessity of running these two additional trains to do the local business.

If that is the case, we go back to the old condition, and we would have slower mail facilities in the South. Our mails would arrive there in my town at supper time instead of 12 o'clock in the day. It would be the same in many other Southern towns. The whole day would be lost in the transaction of business. We are not alone the beneficiaries of this system. Every merchant that lives in New York, New England, or Pennsylvania, or those sections of the country who want to do business with us, has that business facilitated by being put on this extra mail facility. I do not blame the gentleman from Indiana or the gentleman from Cincinnati, who have repeatedly fought this proposition. They know that, and they know that it brings the Eastern merchant and the Eastern manufacturer into closer competition for the Southern trade, and they would like to exclude that competition. They would like, of course, to take the entire trade of the South for the Queen City of the West. Cincinnati would like to exclude New York in competition with our trade, but as far as we are concerned we want to deal with both the Middle West and the great East. We want all the trade facilities, as well as the rapid mail facilities, by reason of this special appropriation, and therefore we ask that it be continued in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill to provide appropriation for the Post-Office Department suggests to my mind several matters relating to the postal service which may well at this time be urged for early consideration by this House. For years the building in which the present post-office in New York City is located has been inadequate to the needs of the postal system in that city.

The New York post-office, for want of proper accommodation, lacks the facility for handling the tremendous amount of mail that passes through that office. The postal officials there have time and time again implored that the Government furnish the much-needed improvements. The public press has for years agitated the subject, and Congress has been repeatedly appealed to; yet for some mysterious or unknown reason the requests from this city, of such vital importance to the whole country, have gone unheeded by this House, and the relief to which the people are entitled in the way of having a suitable and adequate post-office commensurate with the needs of the great and ever-growing city of New York has been most grievously and, permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, shamefully delayed by this Congress.

It is from no mere sense of local pride, nor is it to simply satisfy the demands of a particular locality, that I rise to call the attention of the gentlemen of this House, as well as the attention of the country at large, to the urgent and imperative demand for the erection of a post-office in the city of New York of a size and with accommodations ample to meet the requirements of the postal service of the country transacted through the office at New York. It is because, to use the words of the New York Herald, in an editorial from which I propose hereafter to more fully quote—

The New York post-office is an institution not of local, but of national, scope, and the people of the entire country are interested in its operation.

In asserting its demand for a suitable post-office and a reasonable appropriation therefor, New York City comes to this House asking no favor, seeking no special privilege, begging no gracious concessions; she comes in her right as the foremost city of the Union, the metropolis of the Western Hemisphere, the destined greatest city of the world, demanding that she be accorded at the hands of Congress adequate quarters for the busiest post-office in any of the States of this Union. She demands this in no selfish spirit, not for herself alone; she demands it for the benefit which will accrue and the general advantage which will inure to the entire people of this land.

Strange, indeed, that it should require so much agitation as well as repeated insistence of a united and entire delegation to bring about this much-needed improvement. Surely no one in this House can fail to understand our wants. With a comprehension of the needs of the postal service such as I assume is possessed by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, who is at the head of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, it may well be wondered why and wherefore is this delay on the part of the committee in reporting the measure so earnestly urged for a new post-office. Why is it that New York is discriminated against? Why is it that from the other side of the Chamber comes no ready response in the shape of legislation for what is so sorely needed to facilitate the mail service in the Empire City of the United States?

Surely no man, from whatever section he may come, will deny to New York the title she has richly earned as the foremost city of the Union. She is the radiating center of this country's commerce and finance. To and from her magnificent harbor, unequaled anywhere in the world, come and go the shipments of freight, making and upbuilding trade, "the calm health of nations," enriching your markets, upbuilding your commerce, promoting your industries, advancing your prosperity, adding to your wealth, and augmenting your greatness.

In her streets and avenues of finance the business man and financier conduct their operations to an extent unequaled anywhere else in the land, Her business highways afford evidences of mercantile activity not seen in any other place in the world. Her population is the most composite on earth and her wealth almost boundless. Travel where you will and you find no such gigantic structures for business purposes as meet your gaze in this energetic city. Its numerous and well-appointed hotels are the most commodious and beautiful of any throughout the country, and so great are the accommodations they afford that be the event what it may which attracts visitors to our city, they accommodate them without apparent inconvenience or overcrowding.

Her busy workshops, numbering thousands upon thousands; her numerous stores, her countless places of mercantile pursuits, her many banks and banking houses, her well-filled warehouses, her many docks encircling the entire island of Manhattan, to which come the steamships and the vessels from almost every portion of the earth; her busy railway stations, her much-traveled ferries, all attest and quickly suggest to the mind the necessity for ample postal facilities. It would be needlessly consuming the time of this committee to dwell in detail on what makes up the magnitude and eminence of the city populated by 3,000,000 people. Think of it, gentlemen, 3,000,000 people! Many of the States, each of which under the Constitution is represented by two Senators, and one or two Representatives in Congress, have not by far a population as great as this metropolis.

Enough, however, has been said to indicate that in such a city the accommodations for mail service should be the very best that this nation can afford, and yet there seems hesitation in granting what, under the circumstances and in view of the statistics, to which I shall call your attention, is a comparative insignificant sum of money for this great public purpose. It has been suggested by the delegation from New York that $2,500,000 should be appropriated for a new post-office building. Do you know that this sum is but about 35 per cent of what was last year's net revenue from the New York City post-office alone? Do you realize that one-tenth of the gross receipts of the entire postal system is obtained from New York alone? Do you realize that year by year the population of New York is growing larger and its postal demands greater, that each year the receipts from our post-office are greater, and go to swell the coffers of our public Treasury.

Let me read some of the statistics furnished me by the Post-Office Department and then answer whether in common fairness there ought to be a single day's delay in acceding to the request for the required appropriation.

I want to read, Mr. Chairman, a letter transmitted from the postmaster at New York to the Department at Washington in reply to my inquiry for the information. It is as follows:

Very respectfully,

C. VAN COTT, Postmaster.

I would wish that each one of you had visited our principal post-office at New York. I have seen much better, much finer, much more handsome, certainly much more commodious post-offices in many other cities. For want of sufficient room we are compelled to put second and third class matter in the cellars, where the light of day never enters.

There it is piled up from floor to ceiling, and in the busy months and during holiday seasons, when the needs of the community for postal-service are greatest, the mail becomes congested and delays in transmission result. These delays are not attributable to our able, efficient, and painstaking postmaster, Mr. Van Cott, nor to his hard-worked staff or corps of employees. They are due to the lack of proper quarters—to the want of sufficient space to handle the mails. Yet there is hesitation to establish a proper post-office in the face of all these facts.

The views of New Yorkers—nay, of all men who are interested in the mail service at New York and who have an interest in the proper and prompt transmission of the mails and the handling of mail matter—are briefly epitomized in an editorial published in the New York Herald of February 28, 1902, which I request the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AN OUTRAGE ON NEW YORK—SEND A DELEGATION TO WASHINGTON.

It's an infernal outrage!

That's the plain English of it. There's no other phrase to adequately describe the manner in which New York's appeal for an uptown post-office is treated by the House of Representatives, and particularly by the Committee on Public Buildings, of which Mr. MERCER, of Nebraska, is chairman.

For years the postal officials of this city have been begging for sufficient space in which to handle the mails. The whole country knows the facts and the whole country is interested in obtaining the needed improvement. New York is no way station. This is the clearing house for the bulk of the mail matter of the United States going to foreign countries or received from them.

The speed with which one of Mr. MERCER'S mercantile neighbors in Omaha gets a letter from Europe depends upon the postal work done in this city. Whether an important letter from Omaha shall catch a fast steamer leaving this port or be held over for days turns upon the facilities at the disposal of the postmaster here. The New York post-office is an institution not of local but of national scope, and the people of the entire country are directly interested in its operation.

One-tenth of the gross receipts of the entire postal system is obtained from New York. The work here is equal to that of seven other large cities combined. It is increasing faster here than anywhere else in the Union, and the old building erected in lower Broadway a generation ago has been outgrown so long that the fact is ancient history. Mr. MERCER knows that. With members of his committee he came here several years ago and made a thorough inspection, and expressed his conviction that a new building was then sorely needed.

Early in the present session he declared that New York's need was aggravated, and expressed himself strongly in favor of an appropriation for the purpose. The amount asked for is less than three month's postal receipts in this city, but the appropriation was blocked last year on the ridiculous pretext that if the new building were given to New York it would be necessary to furnish money for public buildings in towns that the average citizen does not know where to look for on the map. This year the bill granting two and a half millions has passed the Senate, and is hung up in the House Committee on Public Buildings.

A special dispatch from Washington to this morning's Herald describes the situation, and it is one to make the people of this city boil with indignation. Mr. MERCER and other advocates of the measure apparently believe that the House will not pass the bill as it came from the Senate, and they plan to include the appropriation in an omnibus bill to carry tens of millions for various projects, and which will be reported late in March. Thus the modest sum needed to furnish vital necessaries for the transaction of postal business in this metropolis—the distributing center for the country's mails—is to be made contingent upon the success of a scheme for the distribution of a dozen times or twenty times the amount to the constituents of these narrow-minded, logrolling Representatives.

THE SALARIES OF LETTER CARRIERS SHOULD BE INCREASED.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The time allotted to me is about expired. I had intended to discuss another matter relating to the postal service. It is on the subject of the pay of letter carriers. In my judgment their pay should be increased. They are underpaid in cities; they certainly are underpaid in the city of New York. They constitute an important branch of the public service. Their work is efficiently and faithfully performed. They deserve higher pay.

In my city they are frequently overworked. The cost of living in the city is high, and I regret that any man in this House should object to pay decent and living wages to a faithful employee. The fact that the employee is in the service of the Government should make no difference. "The laborer is worthy of his hire" is a maxim as applicable to Government employees as to those in private service. In my judgment a letter carrier who has been in the service for a period of three years or more in the cities of the first class ought to have at least $1,200 per annum.

But time does not permit me to now discuss this question as fully as I desire. I shall avail myself of the opportunity at a later stage and at a more appropriate time to present, as I understand it, the just claim for an increase in the salaries of the carriers. Gentlemen, in dealing with New York, be just, be fair. You may not desire to be generous, but accord to the metropolis of the nation, to the city which is America's pride and part of America's glory, that justice to which her position and station entitles her at your hands. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. SMITH of Illinois addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, in the course of a discussion in Committee of the Whole, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] made certain observations which should not be allowed to go unchallenged. In defending the course of the Secretary of State in refusing to apply to the British Government for safe conduct for Americans who seek to relieve the suffering of the Boer women and children imprisoned in the concentration camps in South Africa, he contended that respect for international law compels our State Department to ignore these requests.

I deny that any hard-and-fast rule of international law governs this question.

Before proceeding to discuss briefly the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] it is probably advisable that I should cursorily call attention to the reasons which incline the British Government at this time to exclude from its lines in South Africa all persons, by whomsoever sent there for the purpose of relieving the distress incident to that terrible conflict.

Not only has Lord Kitchener excluded surgeons sent to South Africa by the Swiss Government, six in number, for the purpose of ministering to sick women and children in the concentration camps; he has refused admission to English women, who find no fault with the war or the purposes for which it is waged, but who have witnessed the horrors of the concentration camps, who have attempted to go to the rescue of the sufferers, and who have excoriated the British Government for its inhumanity in unmeasured terms.

What is the rule of international law in reference to this matter? The gentleman from Illinois cites what took place during our civil war thirty-five years ago. Does he not know——

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to place in his hands a letter I have received bearing on this point.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Illinois know that at least two international conferences—notably the recent gathering at The Hague—have since the period to which he referred entirely modified the rules and usages of war?

He says that under the rules of The Hague conference the Red Cross Society was adopted as the medium through which relief may be extended in cases such as exist in South Africa. That is true. But is there anything in the proceedings at that conference declaring that no other humane agency devised for the purpose of relieving distress, and especially for the purpose of relieving women and children and noncombatants, shall be recognized?

He said that Mr. Davis, the President of the Southern Confederacy, would not have permitted unauthorized persons to enter the Confederate lines for the purpose of distributing relief; that had such a person applied for such permission, it would have been unconditionally refused. I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] for handing me a letter from a Union soldier, received by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] since the discussion of the other day. A part of this letter, which I will now read, answers this part of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. Listen to it:

I read in the newspapers that Mr. HITT said:

Jefferson Davis would not have allowed Northern sympathizers to perambulate through Southern camps to distribute relief.

My brother, Herbert Withington, was taken prisoner with his colonel, O. P. Wilcox, of the First Michigan, in the civil war. The prisoners were in need of everything. Their friends in Michigan gathered supplies, and the Confederate authorities permitted Mrs. Marie Wilcox, the imprisoned colonel's wife, to distribute the relief.

This is a sufficient reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman's contention from beginning to end was predicated upon a false assumption. He said repeatedly that no government would allow people to pass to and fro through fortified lines during war as a means of extending relief to suffering people. Of course not. Who has proposed to request permission to enter fortified places? Who is seeking to tramp to and fro through the fortified camps in South Africa?

Are the British compelled to maintain fortified camps in South Africa? Is it conceivable that valuable information as to military operations or as to British fortifications might be communicated to the Boers by the men and women who seek an opportunity to go to the rescue of the sick and dying women and babies who are in the horrible prison pens of South Africa? The camps in which these prisoners are confined are in a country occupied by 250,000 British soldiers. Opposed to this great army are forces which to-day, according to the best accounts, number less than 20,000.

Does the gentleman from Illinois—does our Secretary of State—believe that the real cause of objection to allowing charitable inhabitants of neutral countries to relieve these sufferers is the fear that those who go to South Africa with food, clothing, and medicine for women and babies who are starving, clad in rags, and dying for want of medical aid, will somehow help the military operations of the Boer army?

Nations, like individuals, must take cognizance of facts concerning which there is no room for doubt. Why should the American Republic not take cognizance of conditions prevailing in South Africa? Why, we upbraided and finally went to war with Spain for her cruelty to the Cubans. May we not be permitted to relieve the victims of Kitchener's far more brutal policy in South Africa?

Upon what pretext could the British Government withhold its consent?

Mr. Chairman, what a travesty it is—this pretense that in order to maintain strict neutrality we must abstain from asking permission to bestow charity upon suffering women and children. Sir, I charge that the State Department has not maintained the strict neutrality of this country. It has winked at the deliberate violation of a rule of international law laid down by the Hague conference, and has made no protest against England's violation of every rule of civilized warfare laid down at the Hague.

One of those rules prescribed that private property should not be taken or wantonly destroyed by an invading army, and yet upon the pretense of military necessity the British army has applied the torch to three-fourths of the habitations of the farmers of South Africa, reducing a prosperous and wealthy community to a condition of desolation and despair.

Another rule of The Hague conference forbids war upon noncombatants. It is incontrovertible that having burned the houses over the heads of the women and children, the British soldiery have piled farming utensils and vehicles upon bonfires and burned them, and that when women, thus made homeless and beggared, have begged they might be conveyed in their own comfortable conveyances to the barbed-wire prison pens, where they are starving by thousands, they have seen these vehicles wantonly destroyed and have then been conveyed long distances in army transport wagons to the horrible prison camps in which they are confined.

Thus women and children numbering 25,000 have been imprisoned in the Transvaal Republic alone. And what about the rations issued for their sustenance? The British medical officer in charge of that camp at Johannesburg stated in an official report that the rations were not sufficient to preserve the prisoners in good health, and the British officer having charge of the police regulation of the camp reported that the ration furnished was not sufficient to keep body and soul together.

But that is not all. In issuing rations a distinction was made between women and children whose husbands and fathers were still in the ranks fighting for their country and those whose husbands had been killed or had surrendered or had never been engaged in the war. Bear in mind that the full ration was insufficient to keep body and soul together, according to the statement of a British officer; and yet it was ordered that women and children whose husbands and fathers were still fighting for their country should receive only half of it.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the explanation of England's aversion to the relief of the sufferers: The world would thereby be afforded a glimpse of the hell which British cruelty has created in South Africa. Miss Hobhouse, a philanthropic British woman, went there with money, raised by the good people of England, to relieve the distress, and made a report that so shocked and shamed the British nation that she was prohibited from returning with additional relief. Oh, what a pity it is—what a reproach to all humanity—that no hand is outstretched to save this heroic people from destruction! No wonder that Chamberlain and Kitchener have closed the door to prevent humanity from even a glimpse of the charnel house which is relied upon to destroy a race and overthrow republican institutions in South Africa.

Think of it! The prevailing mortality among the children is so great that if it continues, in two years the 25,000 children confined in prison pens in South Africa will be dead. Think of it! Twenty-five thousand children made prisoners of war and deliberately starved to death by order of the commander of the army of a power professedly Christian and presumably civilized! And we are told that the rules of international law prohibit our Government from respectfully asking safe conduct for philanthropic men and women who would go to the relief of these unfortunates.

Such talk might have sounded well in the dark ages, but, thank heaven, there has been at least an attempt to so modify the laws and usages of war that at least theoretically they are somewhat in consonance with the laws of good conscience and humanity. Thank heaven, it is no infraction of international law to offer clothing to the naked, food to the starving, and medicine to the sick, whose misfortune it is to dwell in a country ravaged by war. And thank heaven that the laws of civilized war prohibit, even if the nations do not prevent, wars of extermination. Women and children, those too old or too young to be dangerous to belligerents, may not be lawfully killed or even impounded as prisoners of war.

In explanation of his pro-English proclivities, will the Secretary of State dare to plant himself upon the defense attempted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and say that some rule of international law prohibits him from asking of the British monarchy permission to send relief to this suffering people? If so, what becomes of the rules laid down at The Hague conference? He may say that the Boers are unreasonable in such prolonged and desperate resistance of Great Britain.

What of it? A rule laid down at The Hague conference declares that when a country is suddenly invaded and the people take up arms spontaneously in its defense they are entitled to be treated as belligerents and that the war against them must conform to the code laid down at the conference; and it was also declared that in defending their country they shall have a right to determine for themselves how far resistance shall go. The Boers—subject to the rules of civilized warfare themselves, of course—may prolong their resistance indefinitely, and the rules of The Hague conference accords to them all the rights of a belligerent power.

I say that any person who will read the deliberations of The Hague conference will find that many of the most wise and beneficent regulations there, established for the control of the operations of armies, were placed in the body of international law at the instance and on the initiative of the British representatives and sanctioned by our representative, and that the British Government and our own have been guilty of the deliberate violation of these rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee understands that the time for general debate is limited to three hours. The gentleman from Georgia submits the request that the gentleman from Missouri may be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. At the suggestion of the British representative in The Hague conference horses were declared contraband of war. Can the United States under this rule permit the further maintenance of a British military supply depot on American soil from which thousands of horses are being shipped to South Africa? Every horse that leaves the coast of the United States for South Africa could be lawfully seized upon the high seas, if only the Boers had armed vessels and were capable of making the seizure. Why has not the Secretary of State taken notice of facts well known to the children of the country?

Why has he permitted the establishment upon the American coast of a British military depot of supplies, conducted by British officers, who do business publicly in their capacity as British officers and unhesitatingly say: "These horses are destined for the British army in South Africa?" The nature of their business, the fact that they are British military officers, is known to every man, woman, and child in the United States, and they are maintaining on our soil publicly a depot for the collection of military supplies with the knowledge and consent of the American Government. The supplies thus collected are publicly shipped to the theater of war, to be used against a country with which we were on friendly terms.

And do not tell me that the South African Republics are not to be regarded as nations. Until their invasion nobody disputed their right to be treated as such. There never was any pretense that the relation of the British Government to the South African Republics deprived them of a place in the family of nations. Formerly, Great Britain asserted and was accorded by treaty suzerainty over the Republics—that is, the right to a controlling voice as to their treaty relations with foreign powers.

Subject to that one limitation, these Republics were free and independent when the war broke out. At what point did they lose their independence? Did they lose it at Spionkop? Did they lose it in the recent battle where Lord Methuen was taken prisoner? They have not yet lost the right to be regarded as nations, and I pray God they never may. They are still in the field, fighting for liberty and independence, and while the clouds of adversity seem so dense as to forbid the hope of future sunshine, when we reflect that the cause of the American army at Valley Forge and at different stages of the Revolutionary war seemed hopeless, and yet they achieved the final victory, we have grounds for the hope that South Africa may also escape out of the hands of the destroyer.

Mr. Chairman, as a nation we have ignored the rights of these Republics, and we have trampled upon the law of nations in doing it. We have an anglomaniac in the State Department, who sees nothing sacred in the cause of the Boers and who sympathizes with the unlawful pretentions of Great Britain. [Applause on the Democratic side.] At the very outbreak of this war every question involved was decided adversely to the Boers by the Secretary of State.

The contention for which they are fighting—the claim to independent nationality and to a place in the family of nations on a plane of equality with Great Britain—was cast aside, and every unlawful assumption of power and authority asserted by Great Britain was confirmed. And now it has come to pass, when the wails of the suffering wives and children of the heroic Boers provoke a responsive chord in the hearts of philanthropists, and they seek to relieve the sufferings of the unfortunates, our Secretary of State discovers some rule of international law that thwarts the promptings of mercy and palsies the hand of charity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Shame upon this farce! Shame upon the hippodrome so long carried on by English and American officials by which this Republic is yoked in the companionship of the infamous power that is strangling liberty and independence in South Africa! Shame upon the cowardice of the American Congress in permitting all this! Every day, I say, "How long, O Lord, how long!" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, the few minutes I shall have will be disposed of in discussing the question of reciprocity between the United States and Cuba, and I would not under any circumstances interpose myself at this time if it were not for the fact that in a public place lately I insisted, as I still insist, that the island of Cuba is domestic territory. I said at that time just exactly what I repeat now, word for word. I said then, Mr. Chairman, that the island of Cuba was domestic territory, and consequently could not be foreign territory; and, if it was domestic territory, it was useless for the Congress of the United States to take its valuable time in discussing the question of reciprocity with Cuba. My words were then as follows:

What I say at this time is supplemental only to my speech on Cuba in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 13, 1902. At this time we hear a great deal said about reciprocity with Cuba, and much to the effect that Cuba is a foreign country, i. e., foreign territory. I assert that this country can not have reciprocity with Cuba, and I deny that Cuba is a foreign country or a foreign territory, but insist that Cuba is domestic territory, as much territory belonging to the United States as Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands, and the title as good in the case of Cuba as that of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. This nation can acquire foreign territory in two ways only—by treaty and conquest. The United States acquired Cuba from Spain by conquest.

When Spain struck her flag and withdrew her forces from Cuba, the sovereignty of this nation over Cuba and its title to the island were complete. It was strengthened when the treaty of Paris was ratified. By that treaty Spain relinquished all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba. By the withdrawal of Spain from Cuba, independent of the treaty of Paris, it followed, ipso facto, that sovereignty over and title to Cuba passed to the United States. And there is nothing in the treaty of Paris to change the result acquired by war. Neither sovereignty nor title lapsed. Neither sovereignty nor title could go to Cuba. No one can question that sovereignty over Cuba and title to the island of Cuba passed by international law to the United States. Sovereignty is nothing more or less than power, and the United States is exercising power in Cuba to-day, as effective as on the day the occupation of the island of Cuba by the forces of the United States was complete.

Under the Constitution of the United States, Congress has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. Congress has never undertaken to dispose of or make any rules or regulations respecting the island of Cuba. Congress did provide, by the act of March 2, 1901, that upon conditions named in the act the President is authorized to leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people. That has not been done, but if done it would not alter the status of sovereignty or title.

The people of Cuba would be permitted to erect a government, but not one of sovereignty. The people of the island would still be under the sovereignty of the United States, and the title to the island would still remain in the United States. By the express terms of the act itself, after affirmative action by the President, the United States would be exercising sovereignty over the island. We are concerned with the status at this time irrespective of what the President may do in the future, and irrespective of what effect the action of the President would have upon the question of sovereignty and title.

Therefore, until the President acts it is useless for Congress to talk about reciprocal relations with Cuba. All the President can do is to withdraw the troops. There has been no attempt on the part of Congress to delegate to the President the power to transfer sovereignty or title—something Congress could not do even if the act expressly directed the President to do so. Hence it is plain to be seen by an examination of the whole question that, at least for the present, sovereignty and title remain with the United States, with at least the debatable proposition that, under the law, after the President has acted in accordance with the terms of the act, the island of Cuba will still be domestic territory.

Therefore it is useless to talk about annexation. This nation can not annex what belongs to it. The only possible question is, Shall the United States continue its sovereignty over the island?

I have been somewhat amazed and surprised at the various criticisms made with reference to that statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this—that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided in terms that the island of Cuba is foreign territory; but I propose, as I have the book here before me, to demonstrate by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the island of Cuba is domestic territory; and therefore if it is domestic territory, it is, I say, absolutely useless for this Congress to spend its time in talking about reciprocity with Cuba on the part of the United States of America.

I have been asked if I am familiar with the Neely case. I have answered that I am—that I assisted largely in drafting the act which returned Neely to the island of Cuba for prosecution and punishment. That case will be found in 180 U. S. Reports, page 109, and, as I say, I am perfectly willing to concede in that case that the Supreme Court of the United States decided that Cuba was foreign territory. It may be valuable for us at this time to first ascertain what is foreign territory and what is domestic territory. Several decisions have been made in relation to this subject. We all know that it is held by the courts that foreign territory is a country belonging to some other country outside of your own jurisdiction.

It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that:

> A foreign country is a country under a sovereignty other than that of the United States. By a foreign port may be understood a port within the dominions of a foreign sovereign and without the dominions of the United States. (Mr. Justice Story, in United States v. Heyward, 2 Gall., 501. See also Chief Justice Spencer in King v. Parks, 19 Johns, 375; also Treasury Regulations, 835, approved in Stairs v. Paislee, 18 Howard, 526.)

Therefore, under the decisions of the courts of this country, including the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, a foreign country is a country outside of our jurisdiction; yet it has been said that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the island of Cuba is foreign territory. Now, we will see what the Supreme Court of the United States says in the case of Neely against Henkel. The language of the court is as follows:

> That at the date of the act of June 6, 1900, the island of Cuba was "occupied by" and was "under the control of the United States," and that it is still so occupied and controlled can not be disputed. This court will take judicial notice that such were, at the date named, and are now, the relations between this country and Cuba.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an absolute inconsistency between the statement of the court in the Neely case and the statement of the Supreme Court when they were deciding the question as to what is a foreign country. When we look at the question independent of the authorities, we can determine the question for ourselves. We can tell that so far as Cuba is concerned this country went to war with Spain and landed her troops on the island of Cuba. It is well known that as fast as our sovereignty extended itself over that island that the territory within our limits became subject to the power of the United States. It may be a serious question as to where the line might be drawn, but if there was nothing said in the treaty or there was nothing said subsequent to the ratification of peace with reference to the line of demarkation, all of the territory that was within our lines would become subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and all of the people living within that territory would owe allegiance to the United States if the occupancy was permanent, and they would have to abandon their allegiance to their own government.

I say this because I do not want to commit the House to my views or spend the time to argue, Mr. Chairman, as to whether or not the territory that thus falls to us becomes a part of the territory of the United States without action by Congress. We know gentlemen divide very largely in reference to that question. But I am certain to-day, independent of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as a matter of reason that the island of Cuba is domestic territory and not foreign territory, because it is purely a question of sovereignty. Our sovereignty extended over the island of Cuba when the sovereignty of the Government of Spain was relinquished. We do not want the assistance of the Supreme Court of the United States to emphasize that statement. I have it here corroborating my statement that when the sovereignty of Spain was relinquished over Cuba the sovereignty of the United States was established there. Now the fact that our sovereignty extended over the island gives us the title.

Therefore it follows, as I say, without citing any decision in support of that position, that the sovereignty of the United States extended over the island of Cuba and that the United States holds the title to the island of Cuba, and in this statement I am supported by the Supreme Court of the United States, notwithstanding that court makes the declaration that Cuba is a foreign country. Now, Mr. Chairman, under the language I have quoted—that we were occupying the island of Cuba and that the island was under our control—it is useless for the court to spend time in saying, as a matter of law, that it is foreign territory and not domestic territory, for it is a question of sovereignty that determines that question, and not any other question. The court makes a long argument to demonstrate that the sovereignty of the United States extended over Cuba. There was no necessity for taking time to explain that, for the country knew full well that our sovereignty extended over Cuba. The court further says, Mr. Chairman, that after we had occupied the island of Cuba there was an order made by the President of the United States creating a military division of Cuba, which was the territorial limits of the island of Cuba, and when we erected a military government over that island we created a civil government there.

Now, that is exercising sovereignty which draws after it the title. They say that on the 1st day of January, 1899, the sovereignty of Spain was relinquished. Now, if the sovereignty of Spain was relinquished, to whom was it relinquished? It could not be to the people of Cuba, because they had no government. Sovereignty belongs to government and can not be separated from it. But I do not need to spend any time with reference to that branch of the case, because the Supreme Court says, what is an undisputed fact, that that sovereignty has been transferred to the United States, and it has never been transferred or relinquished. We not only exercised sovereignty by the erection of a civil government, but we changed the function of government and created four different divisions of government. We also erected a court of criminal jurisdiction and created a postal code, and abrogated all laws inconsistent with that postal code. We also created crimes and provided for punishment of any offenses against the postal code. We went further than that—we have absolute sovereignty over that island.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as some gentlemen have differed with me with reference to my statement and have relied upon the Neely case and said, "Have you read the Neely case, which decides that Cuba is foreign country?" I have said "Yes." Now, let us see what the Supreme Court of the United States says with reference to this question. It is, in effect, like the court of any State finding as matter of fact that it is 10,000 miles distant from one place to another, and that an infant under the tender age of 2 years walked that entire distance inside of two hours. Here is what the Supreme Court of the United States said in this case with reference to this question:

> It is true that as between Spain and the United States—indeed, as between the United States and all foreign nations—Cuba, upon the cessation of hostilities with Spain and after the treaty of Paris, was to be treated as if it were conquered territory. But as between the United States and Cuba that island is territory held in trust for the inhabitants of Cuba, to whom it rightfully belongs and to whose exclusive control it will be surrendered when a stable government shall have been established by their voluntary action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is an express declaration on the part of the Supreme Court of the United States that the sovereignty over Cuba, and the title to that island, is held by the United States and not by Cuba. Therefore if we are exercising sovereignty to-day, and are holding the title to that country to-day, there is no use talking about entering into reciprocal relations with the island of Cuba, because, so far as that is concerned, it is just as much our territory as is Porto Rico or the Philippine Islands. It is true the Supreme Court says that we are holding it in trust, but it makes no difference as a matter of law how we are holding the title; the question is whether we are holding the title, not as to the manner of it, not as to the extent of it. I am demonstrating and simply arguing that the title to the island of Cuba, the sovereignty of that island, rests in the United States, and there is this opinion of the Supreme Court back of it. Now, the court further says:

> It can not be doubted that when the United States enforced the relinquishment by Spain of her sovereignty in Cuba and determined to occupy and control that island until there was complete tranquillity in all its borders and until the people of Cuba had created for themselves a stable government, it succeeded to the authority of the displaced government so far, at least, that it became its duty under international law, and pending the pacification of the island, to protect in all appropriate legal modes the lives, the liberty, and the property of all those who submitted to the authority of the representatives of this country.

Here is an express judicial declaration that the title to the island and the sovereignty of that island passed to the United States, and up to this time it has never been transferred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be well to consider in this connection, as I have not the proper time to separate it, that when this question was pending in the Senate of the United States they tried to make it a part of the law that "the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of the island." That was stricken out, as far as the House of Representatives was concerned. It simply shows that as legislation was proceeding Congress was extremely careful, and there was no intention upon the part of Congress to commit itself either in favor of a permanent annexation or immediate separation.

The Supreme Court further said in this case:

> Yet from the beginning to the end of the war the supreme authority in all military operations in Cuba and in Cuban waters against Spain was with the United States, and those operations were not in any sense under the control or direction of the troops commanded by Cuban officers.

Therefore it is proved conclusively, not only by international law but by the express decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in this Neely case, that the title and sovereignty over Cuba rests with the United States and the United States has never parted with it. I am mindful of what this Congress said when we were making the declaration of war. I am also mindful of the declarations of Congress when passing the appropriation bill with reference to what the President might under certain circumstances do.

But so far as the question is now concerned it is neither here nor there. The President of the United States has never exercised any authority under the law.

Now, this question was further discussed in 182 United States Reports. In the first declaration that was made by the Supreme Court in reference to this question in the Philippine cases they say, on page 199:

> We are unable to acquiesce in this assumption that a territory may be at the same time both foreign and domestic.

Therefore the island of Cuba is either foreign or it is domestic; that must be determined by the question of sovereignty. The Government that exercises sovereignty over the island is supreme; and if it can not be both foreign and domestic it must certainly, under the express language of the Supreme Court, be domestic territory.

The court further discusses this question on page 205. I want to call attention to the inconsistent statement there made by Mr. Justice McKenna in his dissenting opinion in De Lima v. Bidwell:

> Cuba is under the dominion of the United States.

If it is under the dominion of the United States and we are exercising sovereignty over that island, I want to ask my friends here or anywhere, who are in favor of entering into reciprocal relations with that country, whom they can deal with? There is the express declaration of the Supreme Court that "Cuba is under the dominion of the United States." If so, how can Cuba be foreign territory? The court further says, to be fair about this matter—

> We held in the Neely case that it is a foreign country.

But how inconsistent, then, to say we are exercising dominion over certain territory and yet the territory is foreign.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman say that Cuba is in the domain or under the dominion of the United States?

Mr. JENKINS. Under the dominion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course it is; and the opinion which the gentleman just read states that we hold this territory in trust, not for ourselves, but for Cuba. Any law we may make for that territory we make as a trustee.

Mr. JENKINS. It does not make any difference whether we hold it in trust or absolutely. I am saying that the title and sovereignty are with us, and in this I am sustained by the Supreme Court.

On page 343 in this same case the Supreme Court further expresses itself with reference to this subject. It says, confirming my judgment:

> It can not, it is submitted, be questioned that under this provision of the treaty, as long as the occupation of the United States lasts, the benign sovereignty of the United States extends over and dominates the island of Cuba.

We might just as well talk about entering into reciprocal relations with the State of Texas as talk about entering into reciprocal relations with Cuba, a part of our own country, with this statement before us.

The court further says:

> Likewise it is not, it seems to me, questionable that the period when that sovereignty is to cease is to be determined by the legislative department of the Government of the United States in the exercise of the great duties imposed upon it and with a sense of the responsibility which it owes to the people of the United States and the high respect which it of course feels for all the moral obligations by which the Government of the United States may, either expressly or impliedly, be bound.

Now, here again is an express declaration on the part of the Supreme Court of the United States that we hold not only the title and the sovereignty, but that it will require an act of Congress to return that sovereignty and divest ourselves of that title.

The President has not acted under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, and if so, what could he do? He could not transfer sovereignty and title, but in any and all events he has not acted, and Congress can not anticipate his action; but should he exercise all powers under the statute the sovereignty and title would still be with us, for, as the Supreme Court says, it will take an act of the legislative branch of Government to transfer sovereignty and title.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides for an increase in the pay of certain postal clerks and certain railway mail clerks. These increases are justified by the conditions of the service and are proper. I am glad that they have been incorporated in this bill. The clerks affected are indeed fortunate that some consideration has at last been given to their just demands.

It is very much to be regretted, however, that the committee has not made provision for two other equally pressing and deserving betterments of the service. I know of no reason for the failure to provide in this bill for an increase in the pay of the letter carriers, and for the restoration of the pneumatic-tube service in those cities where it had formerly been installed.

The men employed by the Government as letter carriers should receive some consideration from Congress. They are an industrious class of men. They are worked as hard as any body of men in the Government service. For years they have asked for a slight increase in the salary allowed them, and no attention has been paid by Congress to their just and respectful requests and petitions.

My colleague from New York [Mr. SULZER] introduced in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses a bill providing for an increase in the pay of the letter carriers. Despite his constant appeals to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, no action was ever taken on the bill. It was put to sleep in the committee, and from that sleep there is never an awakening. It is difficult to understand why no action was taken on this most meritorious bill. Hardly a member of this House denies the justice of its provisions, the people of the country have made no protest against it, members have not displayed any open antagonism to the bill, yet no action was taken by the committee.

Again the bill has been introduced. It was presented in December, early in the present session. It has been referred to the Committee on Post-Offices again, as the rules of the House require. Some hope has been had that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], having more influence with his Republican colleagues than my colleague [Mr. SULZER] has had, will be able to obtain a favorable report on his bill.

I am not of a very pessimistic nature, Mr. Chairman. Anxious as I am to see justice done to this deserving body of employees I am disposed to be as charitable in my opinion of the committee in charge of the proposed legislation as any member of this House. From my experience and observation, however, I can not find anything in the committee's action this session upon which to base a belief that any more favorable action will be had on the bill now before the committee than was secured in other Congresses.

The provisions of the bill are simple. It requires no great time nor effort nor study to understand its provisions. It merely provides that after a certain date, in cities of more than 75,000 in population, letter carriers shall receive $600 for the first year of service, $800 for the second year of service, $1,000 for the third year of service, and $1,200 for the fourth year and thereafter. In cities of less than 75,000 population the provisions are the same, except that the maximum salary is fixed at $1,000 after the third year of service.

On the 20th of February of the present year my colleague [Mr. SULZER] publicly called attention to this bill and urged the committee to report it. He promised for it the solid support of the Democrats of the House. Nothing, however, has been done. The committee has taken no action. The minority in this House are powerless to force action. Few persons, outside of the members of the House, realize how powerless the minority is under the rules adopted by the majority.

The committees of the House are controlled by the majority. It is not possible, under the rules, for a member to enter a motion for the discharge of a committee from the consideration of any bill that it refuses to act upon, without the consent of the Speaker. Such a procedure is practically unknown to this body. The business of the House is regulated by the Committee on Rules, consisting of five members, three of whom are Republicans. It is apparent to the most casual observer how helpless the Democrats are in this House, how little responsible they are for the failure to pass legislation.

Responsibility for the failure to pass the bill for the benefit of the letter carriers can not be shifted. There is no excuse for inaction. Why should it not be passed? What is the objection to the bill? What reason can be advanced for refusing a maximum salary of $1,200 to carriers in cities of more than 75,000 population.

Within the past few days provision has been made for the permanent increase in the pay of rural free-delivery carriers. I believe that that was proper legislation. Earlier in this session I expressed the opinion that the rural carriers should be given adequate compensation for their work. I am not in favor of extravagant expenditures of public moneys.

I believe that the Government should be administered as economically as possible. But I do not believe that a niggardly policy toward faithful employees will result in efficient service. Government employees should be paid a fair wage. Advantage should not be taken of them by a great Government like this. It pays to treat men fairly. Good service will be more easily secured where men receive adequate remuneration for the services which they render.

The position of a carrier of mail in the large cities is not a sinecure. In heat and in cold, in the most inclement weather, the mail must be delivered. No excuse justifies a failure to perform the carriers' work. The Government is an inexorable taskmaster. The carrier must shoulder his heavy burdens and go through the snow and sleet and enervating heats and deliver the mail to the residents of his route. No work is more faithfully done. Complaints against the carriers are few. Efficient, courteous, and faithful, they are a credit to the service and to the people. The maximum salary paid these men is $1,000.

What is asked for them? Only that in their fourth year of service and thereafter they be paid $1,200. This is not an exorbitant salary nor an unreasonable request. The cost of living in great cities is much more than in rural communities. It costs more for rent, it costs more for provisions, and clothing is more expensive than in the country. It is difficult for men of the capacity of those in the service to live decently and support a family in a fair degree of comfort on their salary of $1,000. It certainly is not possible for them to put anything aside for their old age.

Letter carriers should be on a plane with police officers and firemen. In the great metropolis of this country—the city of New York—the police and firemen are much more favored than the letter carriers. Their salaries are higher; provision is made for the support of those disabled in the service; retirement upon a pension after a certain period of service is possible, and some provision is made for dependent widows.

Contrast their condition with the man employed as a letter carrier. His salary is $1,000. He can never retire on partial pay. No provision is made for him if disabled in the service, no matter how long he serves the Government faithfully and efficiently. When he ceases to be able to perform his duties he is cast aside as useless. No destitute widow or minor child can obtain any help from his lifelong employer.

How little consideration is given to the letter carrier by Congress. For several years they have urged the enactment of a law that would permit the establishment of a fund for the pensioning of superannuated members of the force. The plan entailed no expense to the Government. These men ask that a certain sum be retained from their salaries each month for the purpose of providing for them when old age or infirmity or disability renders them unfit for the service.

The Postmaster-General in his annual report heartily indorses the plan. It appeals to all men as proper and fair and just and reasonable. Yet nothing is done toward its enactment into law. No attention is paid to the matter. These men are entitled to some consideration from Congress. Some one must demand action for them. By an order recently issued by the President of the United States they can no longer ask consideration of measures for their relief. The penalty for exercising one of the most sacred rights guaranteed to the citizens of this country—the right of petition—is dismissal from the public service.

I believe that employees of the Government have as much right to petition Congress for relief legislation, for enactments that would better their condition, as any citizen not in the Government employ. Why should an employee of the Government be discriminated against in this way? Why should his lips be sealed upon matters most important to himself? Who will look after their needs and their welfare if they are not to be permitted to speak in their own behalf? This order is indefensible; it is unfair; it is an injustice to faithful and efficient employees; it is a discrimination against men whose only offense is that they are faithfully serving the Government.

The Postmaster-General, in his annual report, calls attention to the fact that as the force of carriers grows larger, and as the men in the service age, the superannuated constantly increases. While there is time he recommends some action for their benefit. Start now while it is possible to provide for the few, and by the time the number increases to any appreciable extent the voluntary fund that the carriers are willing to establish will be sufficient to care for all who will be entitled to share in it.

Since the Government makes no provision for their retirement upon pay, why prevent the carriers themselves from establishing a fund for that purpose? From the compensation now given to them they can not put aside something year by year for their support when they are no longer able to remain in the Government service.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman states that the salaries of these letter carriers are inadequate, that they are dissatisfied with their condition, that they are unable to lay up anything for a rainy day, and so on. Now, can the gentleman name any instance where any one of them has resigned on account of the inadequacy of the salary? In other words, do they not hold onto these positions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do. I have never known of a man refusing half a meal because he could not get a full one. These men are compelled, of course, to retain their places.

Mr. TALBERT. Are there no other positions open to them that they could seek?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The mere fact that a man does not get adequate remuneration and still continues in an employment is not an argument that sustains the proposition that the remuneration is adequate. In the city of New York there are at times probably 100,000 unemployed men, and I know of no place where the supply of labor is greater than the demand, where men can not be secured to fill places as they are vacated.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask the gentleman if he will not admit that the Government pays larger wages than any private industry, if the Government employees are not better paid than private employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have just explained that in the city from which I come men whose duties are practically similar, or who are on the same plane as the letter carriers, namely, police officers and firemen, receive more than the letter carriers do. The policemen receive a maximum salary of $1,400, and the firemen a maximum salary of $1,200; and there are provisions of law that provide for their retirement when they are disabled or incapacitated for service, and after a certain period of service they are permitted to retire upon a percentage of their pay. That is an illustration that the letter carriers do not receive as much as men in somewhat similar employments.

Mr. TALBERT. Still they retain their positions. They do not resign.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly, they do not resign.

Mr. TALBERT. They hold on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the gentleman is hungry and unable to get enough to satisfy his hunger does he refuse the food that he can get simply because he can not obtain a full meal?

Mr. TALBERT. That is begging the question. I only want to draw the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the fact that there is not an employee of the Government who is not asking for higher wages or an increase of salary, and I should like to know where it would end if we increased them as they ask.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These men are not unreasonable in their request. In the entire country there are only a few more than 16,000 carriers. Before they are permanently appointed they often serve as long as four years as substitutes. During that time they can not engage in other employment. They must be ready to take the place of a carrier on a moment's notice. Some years the money earned by them is a mere pittance. But these men are patient. They are faithful. Without complaint they wait for a permanent place, and then the salary is $600 a year.

It is not extravagance to propose to give them $1,200 a year after four years' more service. It is not an unreasonable proposition. The country will not condemn such legislation as unjustifiable. I believe that the people universally desire that the letter carriers shall be treated liberally. No other public servants come as closely in contact with the people. No other service is under the same constant observation and surveillance. The work of carriers is appreciated.

When no one can venture out of his home on account of disagreeable weather, the carrier of the mail is eagerly awaited, for he bears the messages of friends, the reports of business, and the consolation and cheer that comes from communication with men. Give these men the mite they ask. Make a little easier their conditions. Help to relieve them of their burdens, and in doing so the best interests of all of the people will be subserved by the improvement of the service and of that Department of the Government with which they are in closest contact. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for seven and a half minutes.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, in substance I concur in the statements made by my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] in regard to the urgency and the necessity of the bill for a new post-office in the city of New York.

For a great many years the city of New York has been most unjustly discriminated against by the Congress of the United States in the matter of appropriations for public buildings. I remember that after one of the hardest and the longest fights ever made in this House the Representatives of New York finally succeeded in getting an appropriation to build in the city of New York a new custom-house. For some reason or other the Congress never wants to do justice to the first city in our land. New York City, it seems, must shift for herself.

The post-office building in the city of New York to-day is entirely inadequate to transact the public business. This old post-office was built many years ago. At the time it was built it was no doubt a very good building and made a proper post-office; but at the present time it is practically useless, dilapidated, badly ventilated, and many of the Government employees who work in it are compelled to work down under the ground, where there is no daylight, poor ventilation, and great dampness, and this has in many cases seriously injured their health, and in some cases lives have been needlessly sacrificed.

At all times, I am reliably informed, on account of the insanitary condition of the New York City post-office, many of the men who work there are on the sick list and unable to perform their duties. This constant menace to health and life is a cruel injustice to the honest and faithful employees of the Government. For this reason alone a new post-office building is imperatively demanded in the metropolis.

The post-office of the city of New York yields to the Government every year a net profit of over $5,000,000. It is also the great distributing center of the mails in this country. It is of importance to every citizen of the United States that there should be in New York City a proper post-office, with adequate postal facilities—a building where the Government work can be done without endangering the lives of its inmates.

I can not possibly understand why it is that the Congress of the United States will not pass this appropriation bill for a new post-office in New York City. Its necessity is absolutely imperative, and the matter is so important that delay can not longer be tolerated. There is no politics in it. Every citizen of New York City, regardless of political affiliations, has been appealing to Congress for several years to pass this desirable legislation. Every newspaper in New York City has urged again and again a favorable report of this bill, but for some reason, inscrutable to me, the committee having the matter in charge fails to report the bill. Congress comes and Congress goes, but this bill never passes. It sleeps peaceably in the committee.

Why? I know not, but I do know, and I say, it is not the fault of the members from New York City. In season and out of season, in every session, they have done all that could be done to make this bill a law. In this Congress a determined effort has been made by the two United States Senators and by every member in the House from the State of New York to get the bill reported. After a hard fight the senior Senator from the State of New York succeeded in passing the bill through the Senate. That was some time ago, in January, I think, and ever since then the members from the State of New York have been appealing to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the bill. Week in and week out we have done our best.

Only yesterday I went to see the chairman of that committee and appealed to him to take some action, to do something regarding this bill The gentleman informed me that he was going to report the bill at an early date, but would amend it in regard to the commission named to select the site. Now, I take it, the Representatives of the State of New York care very little about the commission named in the bill to select the site. We do not care very much whether it is the commission put in by the senior Senator from the State of New York or whether it be a commission put in the bill by the chairman of the committee.

That matter is immaterial to most of the citizens of New York. In the end public opinion in New York City will select the site. We can rely on that. All that we now ask for and what we now demand is that the bill be speedily reported and this House given an opportunity to vote on it. It is a disgrace to the Congress of the United States that the city of New York can not have a decent post-office. And the old post-office building is a disgrace to the city of New York.

It is a shame that the city of New York can not get fair treatment in legislation for public buildings, although little towns in almost every State in the Union are able to get large appropriations for public buildings. But the Representatives from New York do not antagonize appropriations for necessary public buildings in other States.

I do not believe that there is a Representative from the State of New York who has ever unjustly antagonized an appropriation for a Federal building in any other State; and yet for some reason or other the State of New York, with the largest delegation in this House, is unable to get the committee to report a reasonable appropriation bill giving the city of New York a safe, decent, and commodious post-office that will not be an injury to the lives and a constant menace to the health of the employees of the Government. and that will be a benefit to all the country in facilitating the distribution of the mails.

The bill only appropriates $2,500,000. It is a modest request for an economically constructed building. Compare what New York asks with what other cities have recently received:

Chicago	$5,552,881	St. Louis	$6,055,737
Philadelphia	6,197,809	Cincinnati	5,796,408
Boston	5,952,218	San Francisco	3,555,055

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not my friend from New York know that they are working on that bill now?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; I know that. I have been working on this matter for some time. I have just stated that yesterday I went to see the chairman of the committee again regarding it, and he promised that the bill would soon be reported. I have the greatest confidence in his statement. I believe at last New York City is going to get a new post-office. But we must not be blamed if we are impatient at delay. We know delays are dangerous. We intend to fight on until the object desired is accomplished. We are not asking for anything unreasonable.

What New York City wants is a new post-office. That great city is entitled to it. Every consideration of justice, of humanity, of business demands it. I say for one of the Representatives from the State of New York that if the committee does not speedily report this bill I will know the reason why, and I shall feel inclined to oppose every bill that comes from that committee carrying an appropriation for a Federal building elsewhere. I care not what town or what State it benefits. It is time for some one to make a stand in this House for justice to New York. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. All the time that the gentleman from Tennessee had was yielded and is exhausted.

Mr. SULZER. Well, just a word more. I do hope that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, will at the earliest possible moment report the bill in favor of the New York City post-office. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Only twenty-seven and one-half minutes are remaining.

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. THOMPSON. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The time limited for general debate having expired, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salary and allowance division: For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices: 1 at $3,500; 17 at $3,000 each; 2 at $2,500 each; 4 at $2,000 each; 10 at $1,900 each; 20 at $1,800 each; 30 at $1,700 each; 75 at $1,600 each; 80 at $1,500 each; 70 at $1,400 each; 130 at $1,300 each; 270 at $1,200 each; 270 at $1,100 each, and 400 at $1,000 each; in all, for assistant postmasters, $1,701,500.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, who seems to be well versed in the Philippine question, why it is that the authorities of the Philippine Islands are paying the teachers sent over there by this Government at the rate of $2 for their work when it requires $2.10 of their money to make $1 of ours?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is simply because they want to change the ratio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object to any answer going into the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not want any inquiry as to the change of ratio that has taken place there under the action of the Philippine Commission.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that this is not germane. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope those teachers over there will find it out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Three thousand two hundred clerks in charge of stations and substations, janitors, messengers, porters, watchmen, stampers, carpenters, firemen, laborers, pressmen, waste-paper examiners, mail messengers, general utility clerks, assorters, general-delivery clerks, inquiry clerks, paper distributers, raters of third and fourth class matter, record clerks, separators, special-delivery clerks, stock clerks, supply clerks, timekeepers, weighers of second-class matter, directory clerks, dispatchers, letter distributers, mailing clerks, money-order clerks, nixie clerks, registry clerks, and stamp clerks, at $600 each, $1,920,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words, in line 21, page 3, "three thousand two hundred" and insert in place thereof "two thousand six hundred."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 3, strike out "three thousand two hundred" and insert "two thousand six hundred."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered proposes to decrease the number of $600 clerks from 3,200 to 2,600. And, if this amendment prevails, I propose to offer an amendment increasing the number of $700 clerks from 1,000 to 1,600, making the total number of clerks in the two classes the same, but giving an increased opportunity for promotion.

As gentlemen on the floor of this House well know, I have consistently urged an increase in the postal facilities in the large cities. I have done this partly in the interest of the postal service itself and partly because I have been convinced that many of the postal employees in Chicago were worked too hard and were too poorly paid. And I presume the same condition exists in other large cities. I have great admiration for the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], who is in charge of this bill. I believe he is an earnest advocate of sufficient postal facilities, and, like the rest of the members here, I have great confidence in his judgment on postal matters.

But, Mr. Chairman, I know from personal investigation that the situation of the clerks in the Chicago post-office for a number of years past has been almost too horrible to believe. Clerks who have been employed in that office for years still remain without an increase in salary, and yet are compelled to work from ten to fifteen hours per day. We all know that the handling of mail is tiresome, both physically and mentally, and that it requires a fairly high grade of intelligence to make a good distributer of mail matter.

I know that it has been frequently suggested here that these clerks in the employ of the Government are not required to stay in its employ and that they may at any time resign. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] asked some one on the floor to-day whether any of the post-office employees had resigned because of their low salaries. I do not know how it may be elsewhere, but I do know that in Chicago many of the postal employees have resigned and have left the post-office service because of the low pay and long hours.

I know, further, that many of the employees who have remained in the service have been discouraged mentally and weakened physically by the hard work and the failure to receive promotion. Many of the best ones have left the service, and many of those now in the service would be able to do more efficient work than they now perform if they were given shorter hours, pay enough with which to buy good food and to live in a comfortable place, and the hope and expectation of an increase of salary as a reward for faithful service. I regret to say that they have not had this expectation, as a rule, in the past.

At the beginning of this session, Mr. Chairman, I introduced into the House a bill proposing to amend the national eight-hour law so as to include post-office clerks within its terms. I am aware, however, that under many circumstances it might be somewhat disastrous to the postal service to have a stringent eight-hour law as to postal clerks, and I have consulted over this matter both with the chairman and members of the Committee on Post-Offices, and also the head officials of the Post-Office Department.

The pending bill goes a long ways toward a solution of the difficulty about the length of hours as well as the increase in salaries. If the amendment which I have suggested can be adopted and one or two other amendments adopted, the bill will absolutely relieve the present difficulty in regard to the post-office clerks.

The bill as reported by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices, increases very largely the number of postal clerks and makes an increase of two or three million dollars in the amount of salaries to be paid for such clerks.

Under the bill there is a small increase in the number of post-office clerks who draw over $1,500, but for the purpose of computation I have assumed that there will be probably as many appointments from outside of the classified service as there will be increases in the number of clerks drawing over $1,500. The bill increases the number of $1,500 positions from 90 to 110. If we assume, for the purpose of computation, that promotions in each case are made to one class from the next lower class, then this increase would promote 20 clerks now in the $1,400 class, and as there are now 200 clerks in the $1,400 class, it would leave 180 of the present clerks without promotion.

For the purpose of comparison I call attention to a memorandum which I have made showing the number of clerks in first and second class post-offices under the present law and the number proposed by the pending bill, at the various salaries.

Clerks in first and second class post-offices.

Salary.	Number under present law.	Number under bill.
$100	1,000	1,300
200	300	350
300	200	250
400	100	100
500	1,600	2,120
600	2,800	3,200
700	1,000	1,000
800	3,900	3,900
900	1,800	1,900
1,000	1,500	2,100
1,100	700	1,100
1,200	800	1,400
1,300	225	300
1,400	200	250
1,500	90	110
1,600	100	110
1,700	118	125
1,800	60	80
2,000	60	75
2,100	7	7
2,200	29	30
2,400	22	25
2,500	7	10
2,600	17	25
2,700	10	14

The bill proposes 250 clerks in the $1,400 class, and in order to fill up this number it would take 70 clerks out of the 225 now in the $1,300 class, and would leave 155 of the present clerks in that class without promotion.

But the pending bill proposes to make 300 clerks in the $1,300 class, and in order to fill up this number it would require the promotion of 145 clerks from the 800 clerks now in the $1,200 class and would leave in the $1,200 class 655 clerks not promoted.

The bill proposes, however, to have 1,400 clerks in the $1,200 class, and in order to fill up this number it would require the promotion of all of the 700 clerks now in the $1,100 class and 45 clerks now in the $1,000 class. That would leave 1,455 clerks in the $1,000 class.

But the bill proposes 1,100 clerks in the $1,100 class, which would promote 1,100 clerks more out of the $1,000 class and leave therein unpromoted only 355.

The bill proposes to increase the number of clerks in the $1,000 class up to 2,100, and in order to fill up this number it would require the promotion of 1,745 clerks from the $900 class to the $1,000 class and leave in the $900 class only 155 not promoted.

But in order to provide the 1,900 clerks in the $900 class it would require the promotion of 1,755 from the present $800 class, and that would require promotions from the $700 class, and so on down.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if this bill becomes a law, and promotions under it are made with some degree of fairness and common sense, practically all of the clerks who are entitled will receive an increase in salary of at least $100 per annum. If the same sort of liberality prevails another year, then further increases in salary can be made to those who draw the lower salaries, and thereby establish the custom of increasing the salaries of those post-office employees who deserve it to the extent of at least $100 per annum until they get up in the higher grades of salary.

Last summer the present postmaster in Chicago was authorized by the Department to make, and did make, an increase of $100 per year in the salary of each of 500 employees in the Chicago office. That was good as far as it went. The present bill will do still more, and I believe will be carried out in the same spirit by the present postmaster.

I believe, sir, that with this increase in the number of clerks, the hours of labor required of the clerks will also be greatly shortened. The present bill, whether my amendment is adopted or not, will increase the salaries and decrease the hours of labor of the post-office clerks throughout the land.

I have called the attention of the Post-Office Department to the condition of affairs in the Chicago post-office, both in connection with the efficient postmaster at Chicago and with other members of Congress from that city, and there has recently been a considerable increase in the efficiency of the post-office there, partly brought about by an increased number of postal clerks and partly by a more efficient system of handling the mails. The clerks in the Chicago post-office in the past have been nearly worked to death. They are now beginning to get a breathing spell.

I have here a statement, which I call your attention to, showing the hours of work actually performed by the clerks in the Chicago post-office for every working day from November 29 last to March 1.

This record shows that during December, which I will admit was a month of heavy work in all the post-offices of the country, the hours of one division of the office was all the way from eleven hours up to fifteen hours of work, leaving out the time which they took for meals, for luncheon, and for supper. Fifteen hours a day some days! During the entire month of December there was no day that at least one set of clerks in the office did not work more than eleven hours.

I would not be so insistent upon this point were it not for the fact that the mail service in the large cities is now suffering from the small salaries which have been paid to these clerks, and which have driven out of the postal service many of the brightest men who have attempted to enter it. It is an impossibility, Mr. Chairman, for any clerk in the office doing the amount of work the mail clerk is required to do, quick in mind to handle and distribute mail matter—it is an impossibility for such a clerk to do good service when he works over nine or ten hours a day. It is not right for the Government to ask it.

But the gentleman from South Carolina will say, Why does he not resign? We have a right to say that the cities ought to be entitled to good postal service. The money that is used for the carrying on of the postal service comes mainly from the large cities. Out of the total revenues of the postal service New York last year contributed more than $10,000,000, and Chicago contributed more than $7,000,000, a contribution of $18,000,000 from these two cities to the postal receipts, which in all for the entire country amounted to a little over $100,000,000, and nearly one-fifth of the receipts of the postal service came from these two large cities. Now, I think they have the right to ask that their postal service be taken care of in better shape than it now is.

I am perfectly well aware, Mr. Chairman, that these receipts do not, as has been frequently said, turn in a net profit to the Government. But, on the other hand, of the receipts of these offices only 37 per cent in New York was used for expenses; only 36 per cent at Chicago was used for expenses in the local office. The rest of the receipts of these offices goes to help pay the rural free-delivery carriers throughout the country; goes to help pay for the transportation of the mail; goes to help pay the salaries of the fourth-class postmasters, who keep nearly all of the money they receive and compel the large cities to pay almost the entire cost of the railway mail transportation.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that the Government ought to be willing to pay to these postal clerks a reasonable salary for the long hours which they are compelled to work, not in the interest of the postal clerks, but in the interest of the postal service. Because it can not be expected to obtain and retain in the service the best of clerks upon salaries which are so small as these.

I call your attention to the following statement showing the receipts at a few of the principal post-offices in the country:

(a) Population included in census of New York.

These cities all turn over a large amount of net postal revenue to the Government. The wise Auditor for the Post-Office Department, in the last annual report, makes the following arguments concerning net revenues or net profits at various post-offices:

"NET REVENUES" OF POST-OFFICES.

Notwithstanding its manifest absurdity, the claim is still put forward in the public prints, on behalf of numerous cities, that their respective post-offices pay large "profits" to the Government. In support of this contention, the Auditor's report is quoted where, in Table 10, a certain amount is given in each case as "net revenues" of the office. But the term "net revenues" is very different from "profit."

There can be no profit at any office so long as the aggregate business of the Department is conducted at a loss. Collections of revenues at local post-offices, consisting almost wholly of the sale of postage stamps, postal cards, etc., are not only obliged to pay the necessary expenditures of that office, but also to pay for the transportation of the mails to their destination and their delivery to the addressees. Because a large amount of mail happens to originate at the New York City post-office, for instance, entailing a correspondingly large sale of stamps and collections for newspaper postage, it does not necessarily follow that the New York office pays any profit whatever in the transaction.

A railroad station would not be held to yield a "profit" simply because the amount of freight bills collected and passenger tickets sold at that station exceeded the salaries of its employees. A moment's reflection shows that in both cases the revenues must be earned outside the post-office or the railroad station and all the expenses incident thereto be paid before any "profit" whatever can be realized. * * * The ten principal cities of the country show a percentage of expense to gross receipts varying as follows:

New York, N. Y	37	Cincinnati, Ohio	37
Chicago, Ill	36	Baltimore, Md	53
Philadelphia, Pa	47	San Francisco, Cal	49
Boston, Mass	46	Pittsburg, Pa	36
St. Louis, Mo	35	Cleveland, Ohio	38

From this statement it will be seen that Baltimore ranks highest among the principal cities for expenditures in the post-office, while St. Louis stands lowest. Assuming the service to be equally efficient and other conditions similar, this showing would seem to be highly complimentary to the management of the St. Louis office, and almost equally so to the others which nearly approach its standard in economy of administration.

It is true in one sense that the net revenues of over $4,000,000 at the Chicago post-office are not net profits. It is also true in another sense that they are. We have the right to consider the surplus at one office as net profits when comparing that office with another post-office. For instance, a fourth-class postmaster who receives less than $50 per quarter keeps all the money which he takes in. As compared with the fourth-class offices of this character the surplus revenues at the large offices are net profits.

It is not true, as suggested by the Auditor, that there can be no net profit at a particular office so long as the Post-Office Department is conducted at a loss. You might as well say that one department in a great department store could not be conducted at a profit when the entire store was being run at a loss. A department in a store may bring in a net profit while the entire business is bringing a net loss. And the same might be true of post-offices. It is, of course, true that the receipts at the post-office must pay for the railway mail transportation.

It should not be forgotten, either, in considering the receipts and amount of business at the New York and Chicago offices, that a very large proportion of the amount of second-class mail matter in the country is mailed at and handled by those two post-offices, and that this class of mail matter is handled principally for the benefit of the other portions of the country. If this second-class mail matter were required to pay reasonable postage rates, then the receipts at the New York and Chicago offices would either very greatly increase or the amount of clerical help required to handle the mail matter would largely decrease.

I have a statement here showing the amount of second-class mail matter mailed and postage collected at the 34 largest post offices during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and which is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I have already called your attention to the receipts at the New York and Chicago offices, but permit me to call your attention further to the fact that the receipts at the New York post-office were greater than the entire receipts from all the offices in any State in the Union except New York and Illinois and that the receipts at the Chicago post-office were greater than the receipts of all the offices in any State in the Union except New York, Illinois, or Pennsylvania. And the receipts at the New York office were greater than the receipts of all of the other post-offices in the State of New York. The receipts at the Chicago office are greater than the receipts at all the other post-offices in the State of Illinois.

The receipts at the Chicago post-office for the last fiscal year were greater than the aggregate gross receipts of all the post-offices in the following-named States, to wit:

South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, North Carolina, Arkansas, Florida, Delaware, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, Nevada, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Oregon.

And I shall insert in my remarks a statement showing the gross receipts of post-offices by States and Territories, etc.:

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen here who do not live in large cities misunderstand and misjudge some of us who happen to represent the large cities. We feel perfectly willing to extend to the more rural districts every proper facility which the Government ought to afford, whether postal or otherwise. We know that we are in the minority in this House. We know that the farmer reigns supreme here, but we insist that it is to the interest of the country, to the interest of the postal service, to the interest of the farmer, as well as the merchant, that the very best postal facilities be furnished to the cities, and we further insist that in view of the great surplus in postal receipts in the large cities, they ought to be given with willing hand the best facilities.

I believe that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] in charge of the bill fully agrees with me upon this matter, and I have great faith that now that his attention has been so strikingly called to the situation in the Chicago post-office, he will continue to give, as I am sure he has recently given, his earnest consideration to the condition of affairs there with a view toward their constant betterment.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize very much with the position and with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. I want to say this of him, that since I have been a member of Congress with him his course has been consistent, and that he only wants a good service. The gentleman, however, I do not think really understands the situation as he looks at the bill. The clerks in the Chicago post-office have been working many more hours than they should have worked, and much of that, Mr. Chairman, comes from a mismanagement of that office. There are other post-offices in the country, permit me to say, where the same condition prevails.

In the early winter a commission was sent to investigate the Chicago post-office, and after they had completed their work the number of hours of work was very materially reduced. I want to make one suggestion about the gentleman's tables before I pass from that subject, and that is, I do not think those tables are absolutely true, or that they tell the whole truth. I have been in receipt of a communication from the Chicago post-office weekly for some time until about a month ago. I found that on that sheet they gave the hours of going to work and the hours at which they quit work. Seeing that table week after week, I replied to the party that sent the communication, asking if they did not eat. It showed that the clerks went to work, say, at 9 o'clock in the morning and worked until 10 o'clock at night without any intermission.

Mr. MANN. May I interrupt the gentleman at this point?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I want to say to the gentleman from California that I suppose his statements are based upon one set of reports which were sent out, I think, from the employees in the Chicago post-office, giving the number of hours employed without regard to the time they commenced or quit work. I will say that since the Commission has been to Chicago—since the changes have been made there—the number of hours of the clerks has been materially decreased, and during the month of February the average time in the office on almost every day in the month was only a little over eight hours a day. I say that in justice to the gentleman's position.

Mr. LOUD. Now, as to the sheets that came to me I knew it was impossible for a man to work from 9 o'clock in the morning until 10 or 11 o'clock at night without intermission, and I asked the gentleman if they did not take any time out for meals, and he replied, "Yes; that was a matter that had been overlooked; that he had included the time that was used for them to take their meals."

Personally, I have used every effort in my power to have the post-office put on an eight-hour basis. I think in a very few months there will not be a city in the country that will not practically be on an eight-hour basis. The condition that existed in Chicago, let me say again, resulted in a very great degree from very bad management of that office. Some men worked three or four or five hours a day and some eleven or twelve. The business of that office was in such a shape that the time of the men could not be properly utilized, which has been demonstrated by the work of the commission that is now in that city. The hours of work there have now been reduced to eight hours, with very little increase in the number of clerks.

Now, the amendment proposing to decrease the number of $600 clerks would result in this—that some new men going into office would go in at $700. The number of $600 clerks that we have provided takes practically every $600 man and promotes him to $700. Now, the gentleman, of course, will readily say that there are——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. Of course the gentleman will very readily say, there is not room enough for them in the class above. That is true; but it must be remembered that in the $600 class are porters, janitors, watchmen, and superintendents of substations who are paid according to the amount of work they do. The maximum salary of the rest of these I have mentioned is $600, and they will remain in that class.

But the committee has the assurance of the Post-Office Department that substantially—I will not say every one, because there are some clerks in the post-offices at $600 who are, substantially, pensioners; many old men who are really not worth $600 a year—but every man in the $600 class who should be promoted will be promoted to the $700 class. As I have said, if this amendment should prevail it would mean the putting of new men in office at $700 a year, and I do not think the gentleman wants to do that.

Mr. MANN. I understand, then, from the remarks of the gentleman from California that, in his opinion, with the changes already proposed in the bill, there will practically be in most of the post-offices an eight-hour basis of labor, and that $800 clerks that ought to be promoted will be promoted, and that the present $600 clerks will receive promotion.

Mr. LOUD. That is substantially correct. I am informed by the Post-Office Department that every large first-class office—I can not say every first-class office, because there are some small first-class offices—but every large first-class office will be absolutely upon an eight-hour basis. In some of the smaller first-class offices, where there is, for instance, only one money-order clerk or one delivery clerk, and there is no one to relieve those officers, the hours may be a little longer.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. LOUD. The committee recommend an increase of over $2,700,000; and we have the assurance that this will put the force on an eight-hour basis, and take care of all the increase of work for the coming year. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word, and I do this in order that I may protest against this everlasting cry for increased salaries. If these demands which are eternally coming up here for increases of salary and which are so strenuously advocated, especially by the Representatives of these large cities, were granted, and given to all Government employees, the Treasury of the United States would soon be bankrupt. There is a demand here to-day, in one way and another, for an increase of salary for every man in the employ of the Government, from the President of the United States down to the most insignificant employee. Just as if money grew upon the trees, and nothing to do but to strike it down. "Increase! increase!" is the cry; and these demands have advocates on the floor of the House by members as if their very life depended upon increasing all around.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we would all like to see these salaries increased if it was right and we would like to see the employees of the Government better paid if it were possible to do so, if they are not adequately paid at present. But must we not stop in this mad rush to increase the expenses of the Government and ask, What is the Government? Of what does the Government consist? The Government is nothing more nor less than the people; and the Government has not a single dollar, and can not get a single dollar, with which to pay these salaries except by first taking it from the pockets of the people by direct or indirect taxation—people who are already tax-ridden to death. Then I say, in the name of the people, in the name of the taxpayers, and in the name of common sense, I want to enter my protest here and now against these increases, against burdening the people beyond endurance.

Just as we are entering upon a discussion, and while only upon the threshhold of this bill, the gentleman from Illinois rises and proposes in a word a measure to increase the salaries of all the mail clerks and mail carriers, especially in the large cities, declaring in loud tones that they are underpaid. A moment ago I asked a question of the gentleman from New York, who was discussing this subject, in regard to these hard-worked people. I asked him whether he could mention a single instance where any employee of this Government in this line of work had ever resigned on account of the inadequacy of his salary and he said he could not. I do not believe there is a man on the floor of this House who can get up and truthfully point out a single instance where any employee of the Government from the President down has ever resigned on account of the inadequacy of his salary. And yet members will howl themselves hoarse in declaring that these letter carriers and railway clerks are starving almost upon the salaries they are receiving from the Government, when not a single one of them would part with the job under any condition.

Why, Mr. Chairman, as a general thing the departments here could get along with a reduction of their force by at least one-third, and then the other two-thirds could do the work better. And in considering the salaries that these employees get we can not forget the fact that the Government pays the largest salary for the fewest hours of work of any private or individual industry throughout the length and breadth of the land anywhere and in any condition. Those people in the employ of the Government are better paid, get more privileges, and have a better time than any other people engaged in any other work in the country anywhere that can be known or mentioned, and why is it that men continually get up here and move to increase their salaries when they know that that increase must be paid by the people of this country, by the farmers of the country, by the mechanics of the country, by the brickmasons, and the laboring people all over the land; that they are the people who must run their hands in their pockets and pay for these increases of salary when their backs are almost broken with the present load?

Now, Mr. Chairman, to what will that eventually lead? What will be the final result of these appeals? Some gentleman to-day in his remarks said that there are now men and women who have grown old and gray in the service of the Government, and have failed to lay up a sufficiency for their old age. Whose fault is it that they have grown gray and old in the service of the Government and have failed to lay up an adequacy? Is it the fault of the Government? No. Is it the fault of the people? No. I ask: Then why should the people or the Government be called upon to support them now? If this be kept up the next demand will be that we have a civil pension list and pension these people, yea this has already been proposed, and I want to say that there are farmers in my district, old in the cause, who have not laid up a sufficiency.

What are you going to do with the farmers? What are you going to do with the carpenters and the blacksmiths, since they have failed through a long life of worry and toil to lay up a sufficiency to keep them in their old age? What are you going to do with all laboring people who have failed? I say, let every tub stand on its own bottom, and let these men who are in the pay of the Government still receive the wages they are getting, for it is ample. I, for one, am opposed to increasing it one cent, and I think it is unjust to the people of this country to have those salaries increased, and I hope it will not be done. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, after hearing the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection thereto?

Mr. TALBERT. I thought that I would drive the gentleman to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's speech very nearly persuaded me not to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

One thousand clerks in charge of stations and substations, janitors, messengers, porters, watchmen, stampers, carpenters, firemen, laborers, pressmen, waste-paper examiners, mail messengers, general utility clerks, assorters, general-delivery clerks, inquiry clerks, paper distributers, raters of third and fourth class matter, record clerks, separators, special-delivery clerks, stock clerks, supply clerks, timekeepers, weighers of second-class matter, directory clerks, dispatchers, letter distributers, mailing clerks, money-order clerks, nixie clerks, registry clerks, and stamp clerks, at $700 each, $700,000.

Mr. FEELY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

[Mr. FEELY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech; but I am not at all versed in post-office dialect or post-office law, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the meaning of "nixie clerk?" I see it in several places in the bill.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will consult the dictionary he will find out what "nixie" means. "Nixie," as applied to a clerk, is a clerk who is designated to decipher substantially illegible addresses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For temporary clerk hire, $175,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out of line 19 the word "one" and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend by striking out of line 19 the word "one" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "two."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment, if adopted, will make the appropriation for temporary clerk hire $275,000 instead of $175,000.

The reason of the proposition is this: It is manifest to every person in the House that there are times in the year when the mail matter is very heavy, and other times in the year when it is not so heavy. I speak, of course, from the experience of the Chicago post-office, but the same is true elsewhere.

In the month of December last in the Chicago post-office the regular clerks were many of them employed eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen hours per day. On the 23d and 24th of December, which of course were heavy working days in the post-office, the longest-working set of employees in the Chicago post-office put in actual time of labor with mail matter of fifteen hours and twenty minutes. During that entire month the post-office clerks worked eleven, twelve, and thirteen hours per day for the longest-working set.

Now, it seems to me that it is in the interest of the postal service to increase the temporary or emergency clerk hire so that the postmasters can, by authority of the Department, put in temporary clerks at these times of excessive mail matter and save the necessity for as great a number of permanent clerks.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] said a moment ago that all Government employees were seeking increases in salary. I do not propose to controvert or to take issue with the gentleman upon that statement. Possibly it is true, and believe it is to be regretted; but this is not a proposition to increase anybody's salary. It is not a proposition to raise any salary.

Mr. TALBERT. It is a proposition to appropriate an extra sum.

Mr. MANN. It is a proposition to put in temporary clerks when the mail matter is excessive, as we all know that it is at certain times of the year. That will make the probable number of permanent clerks less.

I appeal to the gentleman in charge of the bill to permit this increase to be made. It will not be within the authority of the postmasters to expend the sum. It is only by permission of the Post-Office Department that any portion of this money can be expended, and certainly the sum of $275,000 for temporary clerk hire in the emergency seasons of the year is not an excessive sum.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would gladly accede to the amendment which the gentleman has offered if I thought the money would be used if it was appropriated; but this is substantially a new item, having, I think, been included in the bill for the first time last year, when it carried $125,000. I am absolutely certain that if any greater amount of money is appropriated there will not only be no use for it, but they will not use it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me? Does not the gentleman believe that it would be in the interest of the service, instead of working the clerks in the month of December from ten to fifteen hours of actual labor, to have temporary clerks a few hours to do a part of the work?

Mr. LOUD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe that a post-office clerk can do more efficient work working only eight, nine, or ten hours than he can do working twelve, thirteen, or fourteen hours?

Mr. LOUD. I do, Mr. Chairman; and the gentleman and myself can have no difference upon that subject. This item was put in the bill by my suggestion last year.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. LOUD. In order that we might have a temporary force to meet emergencies that arise. That is what we have given that money for. I do not think we ought to give any more. Now, let me say another word. The increase that is made in the appropriation is more than $2,700,000 over the bill of last year, and we are satisfied a sufficient amount of money is carried in this bill in the several items for clerk hire to bring the work down to eight hours, in taking care of the office work, and will give them additional help during the holidays.

Mr. MANN. No one has a greater respect for the gentleman from California than I have, and no one has more confidence in his judgment with reference to the Post-Office Department than I have, but I remember last summer coming from Chicago to Washington for the purpose of interceding and urging for some additional temporary clerks in the Chicago post-office, because many of the clerks of that office were in a state of open rebellion, almost ready to quit the force, because they were worked beyond the limit of their endurance.

Mr. LOUD. That will not occur any more, and it would not have occurred last year, permit me to say—I thought that matter was finally disposed of—if the Chicago post-office had been properly managed. I do not want to refer to it, but you know there was mismanagement there.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I do not think there was mismanagement in the Chicago post-office. I believe the postmasters of Chicago have been very fine officers.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. Suppose they had left, would it have been a matter of impossibility to replace them at once with just as efficient clerks as they were? Were there not nine more standing at the door for every one that would have left, and ready to take the position?

Mr. MANN. It would not have been, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina. There is no great demand in the city of Chicago for the position of clerk in the post-office. A man does not get to be a clerk in the post-office there until he serves a while as a substitute at a subordinate salary; and the demand for good clerks is more than the supply. People do not stand on the streets of Chicago seeking an opportunity to serve the Government as postal clerks by any means, I will say to the gentleman.

But, Mr. Chairman, with the indulgence of the gentleman from California, I would suggest that he must be perfectly aware that in times of holiday there is a great emergency, when help is needed to transact the business of the Post-Office Department. There are tons and tons of mail that is poured into the Chicago post-office, and I suppose into every other post-office throughout the country, during the month of December.

It seems to me that it is a sensible thing to do to employ temporary clerks. Most, of course, of the substitute clerks upon the list will be put to work temporarily to handle the mail matter and send it out properly by authority of the Post-Office Department here. It is impossible to employ clerks during the year and limit the number properly and be able to transact the business when the rush comes at the holiday season.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I am ready for a vote, and hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post-offices, $2,350,000: Provided, That there shall not be allowed for the use of any third-class post-office for rent a sum in excess of $400, nor more than $80 for fuel and light in any one year: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the purpose of leasing premises for the use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly, for a term not exceeding ten years.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I wish to offer there.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "dollars," in line 8, page 11, the following words, namely: "And that a reasonable rent shall be paid by the Government, within legal limitations, and no offer of free room or nominal rent by localities or property owners shall be considered by the post-office officials in locating post-offices."

Mr. LOUD. I raise the point of order upon that.

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a system grown up in the West among these new settlements of trying to pull towns to one street or another by the aid of the United States post-offices. I am told that it is quite usual in Colorado, and I have just spoken to members from Kansas and some other Western States, and they say it is common there, also, for an inspector, when he goes into a town, to be importuned by someone having a block of buildings or an addition to locate the post-office there, and in consideration the rent will be donated by the owners or the neighboring business men.

Last year I had a petition for a post-office to be located in a central portion of the town, and an inspector was sent out. He found that the most of the people wanted the central location. The business men in a less central locality met this appeal of the people by an offer to the inspector of free rent. The Post-Office Department and the inspector informed me that most all of the patrons wanted the central location, and yet the location of this office was sold out for free rent.

When that decision was made, the sneer of contempt was on everybody's lips. You could hear from everybody that the Government put the location up at public auction, peddled it out to the highest bidder, etc.

When the inspector told me that he found that the people wanted the central location, but that he had an offer of a building in a less desirable locality for $1 per annum, I said: "But the Government will not allow you to sell the post-office to real-estate owners." He said: "I have a number of like cases in the State, and have from time to time been ordered to close these contracts, and now have a number of them leased for $1 a year." When this became generally known you can well imagine the pitiable aspect that this Government exhibited. I said to the inspector: "You locate the post-office where you see fit; but pay a fair rent for the building, and do not bring the Government into disrepute, as such an act smacks of a clean sell out of the location."

Here is a company trying to drag the town one way because it has a lot of property and offers it for nothing, and the people are marched out there by a great rich Government to get their mail, and it causes a sneer from every man that sees the post-office in one of these side places. I say the Government ought to pay a reasonable rent, and what this amendment is, and all it is, is that the Government shall not consider these offers in making a location of the post-office, providing it can get rent within reasonable limitations.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] says that he has quite a number of cases in the same way, and my friends from farther West tell me it is common with them in new towns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BELL. Now, all I want to say is that I do not think any of us want these post-offices in this new country peddled around and the inspectors tampered with by the real-estate jobbers and the town-site speculators. This amendment simply provides that they shall not consider the offers of nominal rent or of free rent in any post-office location, but shall pay a reasonable value for rental within the legal limitations. That is all there is to it, and the question is whether we want to keep the Government dignified and above this peddling system that is going on in these new countries and constantly bringing contumely on the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Would not the wishes of the gentleman be reached much better by offering an amendment that post-offices shall be located where the majority of the people want them?

Mr. BELL. I do not know. I suppose that is the presumption now. The question is whether or not we shall countenance this habit that has grown up of the inspectors peddling out the location to town-site boomers and the men who are trying to build up one portion of the town or another.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Would not the gentleman's amendment apply with equal force to an old town where two rival storekeepers each wanted the post-office and were willing to bid down the rent, and who is to determine when the bid gets too low?

Mr. BELL. I do not think the Government of the United States would want to put it up at auction or to make a location depend upon the lowest bid, but it would be willing to pay a reasonable rent.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. But suppose the two locations were substantially the same and equally desirable?

Mr. BELL. It should be for the Government to say whether it wanted to go in here or there, and wherever it goes it should pay a reasonable rent and keep its inspectors from being tempted with speculators. This infamous practice has made many good citizens blush with shame, and it has greatly lowered the Department in the estimation of the people and it keeps the inspectors under constant suspicion. It would probably be difficult to find any considerable number of persons, where any of these $1 per year contracts exist, that do not believe that some unworthy motive actuated the inspector, however good his intentions may have been. These traveling officials should be protected from temptation and kept above suspicion.

Mr. TALBERT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. I suppose, as the gentleman states it, it is now let to the lowest bidder, and the gentleman wants to obviate that.

Mr. BELL. Yes; they are let to the lowest bidder or auctioned off to some locality for free rent.

Mr. TALBERT. And the gentleman wants to prevent the Government letting it to the lowest bidder?

Mr. BELL. I want the Government to select the location best suited to the people and pay a reasonable rent for it.

Mr. TALBERT. I understood the gentleman voted for the contract system in reference to the free rural-delivery carriers, and I would suppose that he would be in favor of the contract system here.

Mr. BELL. I do not know that I voted for that at all. I believed in it, and if I was present, I voted for it.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say that I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. COWHERD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. Would the gentleman have any objection to the Government getting the least rental it could for the proposed location?

Mr. BELL. No, but here is a practice where they are putting up the location of post-offices at auction. The inspector comes into a town and then the real estate men take him in hand and the highest bidder takes the office. It ought to be beneath the dignity of a great Government.

Mr. COWHERD. But they do not let it to the lowest bidder.

Mr. BELL. They let it at $1 a year; and that of course is no rent at all.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman does not mean they actually put it up to the lowest bidder; he means that they try what bids they can get, and then the inspector fixes the amount that he thinks best.

Mr. BELL. The inspector gets into very questionable company when he begins to connive with real estate boomers. He should be removed from such temptations and should not be allowed to besmirch the good name of this great Government in the estimation of the people. The Government has no right to rent without due compensation. I am told that localities often club in and pay the rent, then tender a building in an undesirable locality to some ambitious inspector, and, overanxious to serve the Government, he takes such a place rent free and humiliates and brings the Government into contempt,

Mr. SWANSON. The gentleman's amendment would, as I understand, prevent the Government from considering a low rental for a post-office, even where it is located according to the wishes of the people. It seems to me the gentleman's purpose would be reached by saying that these offices should be located where the majority of the patrons could be best served.

Mr. BELL. No; that is not true. I oppose the despicable traffic in post-office sites. This thing has become humiliating and disgraceful. It has degenerated in many places into a low dickering brokerage. This is too small and contemptible for a great Government.

Mr. LOUD. The difficulties in regard to post-office locations will continue so long as men have a desire to accomplish anything in this way. The gentleman's amendment could not possibly accomplish anything. Therefore I insist upon my point of order that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California raises the point of order that the amendment limits the discretion now vested in the Post-Office Department and is to that extent a change of law. The Chair is of opinion that that is the effect of the amendment, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," line 24, page 12, insert "That after June 30, 1902, the pay of letter carriers in cities of more than 75,000 population for the first year of service shall be $800; for the second year of service shall be $800; for the third year of service shall be $1,000; for the fourth year of service and thereafter shall be $1,200. And after June 30, 1902, the pay of letter carriers in cities of a population of under 75,000 for the first year of service shall be $600; for the second year of service, $800; for the third year of service and thereafter, $1,000."

Mr. LOUD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is one to which I trust no objection will be made by the distinguished chairman of the Post-Office Committee, or by any gentleman of this House. It contemplates an increase in the salaries of the letter carriers, who, together with the postal clerks, constitute the most meritorious class of Government employees. It is an increase that ought to have been made long ago. For days and for weeks we have listened in this Chamber to eloquent speeches of many members of this House on the subject of the rural free delivery, and in the course of that discussion we were told of the hardships, the worth, the merit, the labor, the underpay of the rural mail carrier, and for one I recognize the principle that when employees of this great Government render efficient and valuable service they ought to be adequately and properly compensated.

But the Congress of this country has failed to do justice to the letter carriers in cities, especially in the city of New York, a part of which I have the honor and privilege to represent on this floor. For what period of time the letter carriers have received the salaries now paid them I do not know, but it is certainly at least a score of years since the present schedule of salaries was fixed by law. During these years this nation has made wonderful progress, has prospered and increased. Its cities have grown to gigantic proportions, its business and commercial interests have increased to an extent as astonishing and surprising as they are unparalleled in the history of any other country in the world. Through our activity, our industry, our increased population, our educational facilities, and our American spirit of progress we have become during this score of years the most progressive nation on the face of the earth.

Advancement in trade, in finance, in science, in mechanics, in inventions, in art, in everything which goes to make and build up a prosperous people has marked our history within that time and has been our boast and our pride; and yet, Mr. Chairman, the letter carrier in cities where the march of improvement and the increase in population is ever going on and the scene of activity and strenuous life is ever present—there where his labors are ever growing greater and heavier, where his work is constantly on the increase and his living expenses are growing larger under conditions that naturally obtain in cities—the letter carrier has not been receiving an increase in his pay.

I would ask you whether if an employee in your private business had rendered faithful service and you found that his work had grown greater and greater, month by month and year by year, and that the employee had been prompt and diligent, earnest and intelligent, you would not raise his pay commensurate with his increased duties and his greater experience, yet as the representatives of a nation that ought to act upon broad and liberal lines some of you hesitate to grant to the letter carrier what you would readily grant to one in your own employ.

Why do you hesitate to give the same justice to the letter carrier who serves the Government and the people so faithfully and so well as you would to an employee in a well-conducted business concern? Why do you deny to him an increase in his pay although you are conscious of his burdensome work and his increased labor? Why should the letter carrier be refused the compensation which he ought to have in cities, where the cost of living is high and where to decently support himself and family he ought to receive decent and living wages.

True, no gigantic trusts nor any of the great monopolies who constantly seek special privileges and valuable concessions stand behind or urge the proposition for an increase in letter carriers' pay. Perhaps if they did the measure for an increase might fall upon willing ears and receive more ready consideration in this House. The letter carrier is the faithful public servant, who obediently, courteously, patiently performs his work and with meekness awaits at your hands the justice to which in all fairness and humanity he is entitled. In his request for an increase of pay he has exhibited a modesty that is indeed commendable.

I was astonished at the recent Executive order forbidding carriers, as well as other Government employees, from petitioning or approaching members of Congress with a view to having their salaries or compensation increased. For one, I believe that whether in Government employ or in the service of private concerns a citizen has an absolute constitutional right to petition or request a member of Congress for an increase of his pay, provided he does it in a respectful manner.

The right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances is the prerogative of every American citizen under the Constitution of the land. [Applause.] And this prerogative exists whether the citizen holds office or not, or whether or no he draws pay from the public Treasury. In my opinion, the letter carrier, or any other Government employee, has the same unlimited, untrammeled, unfettered right to respectfully petition Congress for the betterment of his condition as any other man in the land, and the Executive order, in my judgment, constitutes an unjustifiable abridgment of and an invasion upon the constitutional rights of the citizen.

But the letter carriers, trained to strict discipline and obedient at all times to duty and to their superiors, are a most patient class, and since the promulgation of the Executive order none of them have approached me, nor do I believe they have approached any other member of Congress, upon the subject of increasing their pay. But we know what is their fond expectation and their hearts' desire. We know of the request they have made in the past. As men of sense, with an understanding of metropolitan conditions; as men of mature years, who know and appreciate what it costs to support and maintain a man and his family; as men who know of the work daily performed by the letter carriers, we ought not to delay in voting an increase in the pay of these men.

I confidently believe that the community at large is not only willing, but anxious, to have the salaries of the carriers increased. I am sure I speak the sentiments of the masses when I say that the people are willing that these salaries shall be raised. Every labor organization in the cities of this country has given expression of sympathy for the carriers and have requested and implored that their salaries be increased. And why not? Carriers are part of the laboring element of this country. They are ceaseless, untiring, hard-working laborers in the service of the Government.

In my city the Central Federated Union, an influential and powerful organization composed of hard-toiling, honest workingmen, men of brawn, of muscle, and of brain, just such men as have helped to build up the greatness of America, have petitioned that the salaries of these letter carriers in New York City be increased. At this moment I have not at hand the resolutions of the Central Federated Union. I submitted them a short time ago to the consideration of this House and they are on file. They tersely and plainly express not only the demands of the Central Federated Union, but the hopes and the desire and the demands of the other great labor organizations spread throughout this country.

Let me read one of the resolutions of a great and important labor organization existing in my city. It is composed of men of great intelligence, though they may not be blessed with an ample sufficiency of this world's fortune, but in point of high hopes, patriotic aspirations, honesty of purpose, and general intelligence, they are the peers of any average citizen. I have reference to the well-renowned organization known as New York Typographical Union No. 6. Let me read the resolution:

NEW YORK TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION NO. 6,
16-20 Chambers street, New York, March 12, 1902.

To the Members of Congress:

At a meeting of Typographical Union No. 6 held on the 2d of this month the resolutions printed below were adopted unanimously.

We believe that the bill to increase the compensation of the letter carriers should have the support of every Congressman who desires to truly represent his constituents. The workers of the United States are unanimously in favor of the measure:

Resolved, That in our judgment the present salary of letter carriers is not a just compensation for the arduous and exacting duties required of this efficient body of public servants.

Resolved, That in our opinion the bill before Congress increasing the salary of letter carriers in first-class cities to a maximum salary of $1,200 per annum, and in second-class cities to a maximum salary of $1,000 per annum, is a just measure and should be immediately passed.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States, also to the Postmaster-General, Representatives in Congress and Senators from the State of New York.

Your attention is most respectfully directed to the above resolutions, and it is hoped that you can conscientiously give the bill your active support. We should be pleased if you will advise us as to your views of the proposed legislation.

Yours, very respectfully, J. F. HEALY, Secretary.

You see how "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," and how the failure to adequately pay the carriers for their arduous and efficient service has wounded the feelings and touched the hearts of the laboring classes of this country. If you still delay granting this increased pay, the people will know where and on whom to place the responsibility. The failure to adequately pay the letter carriers must fall upon the Republican party, who control the Administration and control and manage the affairs of this House. There can be no question about this responsibility, and I implore the gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber to place no obstacle in the way of giving to the letter carrier the increased salary he so richly deserves.

Much of the time of this present Congress has been consumed in speeches in which we spoke of outraged rights, of downtrodden and oppressed humanity, of fairness to our fellow-men, of downtrodden Filipinos, of unfortunate and starving Cubans. I would sympathize with all downtrodden and oppressed humanity. I would join in every movement for the betterment of conditions and the uplifting of my unfortunate brethren, whether at home or abroad, but in this I would be, as I want you to be, practical.

I would, as I want you to do, carry professions into practice. One way to do this is to remedy existing wrongs and to correct existing injustice. To underpay the letter carrier is wrong; to deny him an increase to which his labors entitle him is a grievous injustice. It is a meanness not worthy of this country; it is a false economy unbecoming and unworthy of the American Congress. It is in opposition to the principle that I would advocate in the case of every wage-earner, "an honest day's wages for an honest day's toil." [Applause.]

There is no class of public employees, whether Federal, State, or municipal, who work so hard as the letter carrier, unless we also except the clerks in the postal service in the large cities. In sunshine and in storm, in rain and in snow, under the burning sun of summer, and in the cold and icy blasts of winter, whatever may be the weather and whatever the season, the letter carrier, carrying and distributing his heavy mail, works day in and day out, from early morn until late in the evening, going upstairs and downstairs time without number, until at the end of each day's work he goes to his humble home, tired and weary and footsore from the work he diligently performs. And in all this work he exercises great intelligence. In the delivery of mail he must be careful and discriminating; he deciphers every conceivable kind of handwriting, and displays an expertness of which many and many a better paid Government employee is not at all capable.

I have often witnessed on the excessively hot days of summer the letter carriers traveling along their routes carrying heavy mail bags, sweltering and almost overcome by the heat, trudging up and down flights of stairs, running in and out of houses, continuing their work until the last mail of the day was punctually delivered. They never wavered; they knew the importance of a prompt delivery of the mails. In the bitter months of winter we find them working like beavers, never fearing hail or sleet or storm, and carrying during the busy months loads of mail that bear them down and under which they often fairly groan. Yet they do this work with apparent cheerfulness; they do it without grumbling, and what is more, they do it to the satisfaction and approval of the community.

When to-day I occupied the floor on the subject of providing a new post-office for the city of New York, I took occasion to speak of the enormous amount of mail work done in our city. I spoke of the large revenue which flowed into the coffers of the Treasury from New York City alone. The figures I then read demonstrated the enormous amount of labor incident to the postal service of our metropolis. Briefly, again, let me refer to some of the figures appearing in the communication made to me by the Post-Office Department. Why, in 1901 there was delivered in New York City, in the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx, 1,988,138,165 pieces of first, third, and fourth class mail matter and 231,131,252 pounds of second-class matter.

It is needless to dwell at greater length upon the tremendous amount of mail daily distributed in the great city of New York. But many in this House, and I venture the assertion that even many otherwise well-informed citizens in my own city, are not fully aware of the prodigious amount of labor entailed upon the carriers. You may get a slight idea of the tremendous requirements of the postal service and the consequent labor upon the letter carriers when I tell you—and my figures were obtained in a personal interview I had with the New York postmaster—that there are six buildings alone (and they are only a few of the many hundred of the great structures in the metropolis) that have a business population, or, to use the phrase of the postal authorities, "a daily population" of 24,500; in other words, in the six office buildings to which I have reference, almost 24,500 people receive mail matter daily.

This may be astonishing to many of the gentlemen of this House, and of course astonishing to many of the business men of New York. For instance, in the Broad Exchange Building we have 6,500; in the Park Row Building, 4,000; in the Equitable Building, 3,000; in the Bowling Green Building, 3,000; in the Syndicate Building, 2,000, and in the Mutual Life, when it shall be completed, 5,000. Of course these are approximate figures, but they tell of the gigantic work incident to the postal service in our great commercial city. Did time permit I would like to picture the conditions prevailing in the thickly populated sections of New York where the tenement and apartment houses stand, where the carrier mounts stairs. goes on his rounds from door to door delivering his mail until when evening comes he goes exhausted to his humble home. In that portion of New York embraced in the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx we have as many as 3,000 letter boxes from which mail is daily, and almost hourly, collected.

Surely after a recital of the figures contained in the letter of the Post-Office Department which I read to-day, as well as those to which I have called attention in the course of these remarks, you may get some idea of the exceedingly heavy work entailed upon everyone, whether carrier or clerk, connected with the postal service of the city.

What has been the net revenue derived from New York City alone? Why, in 1899 it was $5,578,933.39; in 1900 it was $6,106,970.24, and in 1901 it was $6,991,790.40. Think of it! We contributed, through the energy and activity of New York life and its conditions, the enormous annual revenue of nearly $7,000,000. We do one-tenth of all the postal work of the United States, and we certainly ask for nothing unfair when we ask that in the face of the enormous labor entailed upon the carriers their salaries be raised after the third year of their service to $1,200.

My friend and able colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] took occasion to say, when the proposition for a new post-office was under discussion, that firemen and policemen in our city were much better paid than our letter carriers. So they are. They, too, constitute an important branch of public service. The letter carriers' work is just as hard as theirs, and in many instances a good deal harder, and in some respects more responsible.

We believe in paying proper salaries in our city to the men who serve the community in protecting human life as well as guarding public and private property, and we want the nation to adequately pay the letter carriers for their work. I reiterate what I declared in a former discussion. "The laborer is worthy of his hire" is a maxim as applicable to Government employees as to those in private service. It is not putting the case too strong when I assert that it is a disgrace to the country that the letter carriers are not better paid. Congress has treated them shamefully; it has treated them niggardly. To them the sympathy of every honest and fair-minded man is due. It is unbecoming to treat these men in the spirit of narrowness and illiberality. It is unfairly taking advantage of their situation.

When the letter carrier has grown old and gray in the service, when bowed down with age or tottering with infirmity, he no longer can trudge along the public highway, climb stoops and stairs, and carry and distribute the mail, he is forced to retire from public service. When that time comes he finds himself as a rule without means, and compelled to depend either on the family he has raised or kind-hearted friends for support and maintenance in his declining years. For him there is no pension; he can not look to the Government, after years of faithful service, for his maintenance in old age.

I was surprised to hear it said by some of the members of the House, "Why doesn't the letter carrier lay up something for his old age?" What! Lay up something for his old age out of $1,000 a year, after undergoing the cost of living even in the humble fashion in which necessarily the letter carrier must live under conditions incident to city life? Really it can not be that any man understanding conditions obtaining in city life can seriously believe that a man with a family can lay up enough to protect him in declining years out of a salary of $1,000 a year.

I was amused by the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads [Mr. LOUD] when he spoke of how letter carriers had importuned and annoyed him. He said that when the time would come that he passed out of Congress he could sit down in peace and happiness and enjoy his breakfast. I am glad he is so well situated. I congratulate him upon enjoying so comfortable a position.

I am delighted to know he is so contentedly fixed, but in the enjoyment of his fortune I beg him to remember that the letter carrier, when worn out with service, will not be able without aid from other quarters to sit down as peacefully and as happily as the able and distinguished gentleman has told this House he would when his time came to finally retire from Congressional life. I trust he will remain in the public service for many years, but I want him to display a liberality and a generosity which will testify that he is willing to pay living wages and make proper remuneration for the service of the worthy men whose cause I am pleased to advocate and in whose interests I earnestly plead to this House.

My friend and able colleague from New York [Mr. SULZER] introduced in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, and Fifty-sixth Congresses bills for the increase of pay to letter carriers in cities. He endeavored to secure action upon these bills, yet his earnest and persistent efforts were in vain. The bills were allowed to sleep the sleep of death; they were smothered in committee, and no good reason has ever been assigned why this House was not given an opportunity to squarely vote upon the measure. Let the bill now pending see the light of day. Let it be reported. Let us vote on it, and you who help to stifle it will see how it will receive the favorable vote of this body. Bring it out. Let us vote on it. That is the square way of dealing openly with a matter of this kind.

No, gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber, you can not escape the responsibility of stifling action on the just demands for an increase of the carriers' pay. You may put the bills to the sleep that knows no waking, but the people will know that the fault is yours. The people, irrespective of party or party lines, want the pay of the carriers increased. The press, I think, throughout the country—I mean in the cities throughout the country—are unanimous and agreed that the demand for an increase of salary is a fair and a just one. The press in my city has advocated the increase, and the New York Journal, ever and always advocating the cause of labor and the protection of the industrial class and the oppressed, has most warmly espoused this meritorious cause.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the fact that under a strict application of the rules of this House my amendment to increase the pay is subject at the present time to the point of order raised by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. He has courteously reserved that point of order until the conclusion of my remarks. For that indulgence I thank him; but if he has been generous to me, I want him to be generous to the letter carriers. No; he need not be generous. I want him to be just, I implore him to be fair, I entreat him not to allow himself to look upon the request for increased pay in any narrow light; but I want him and his Republican colleagues, as I want my Democratic colleagues, to face conditions as they are.

I want them to harken to the voice of labor; I want them to respect the timely expressed wishes of the workingmen of this land; I want them to deal fairly and squarely with the letter carriers, and provide for them decent living wages and honest pay. Talk of humanity! There is no more humane act you can do than to pay the industrious, overworked, efficient letter carrier, who serves the public so well and so diligently, a fair rate of wages. Tell me who objects to that. Some of the members of this House, yes. But not the public. The American people love fair play [applause], and I challenge any member of the House to produce a single protest from any reputable citizen against the proposition to increase the salaries of letter carriers in large cities.

This Congress has, as the preceding Congresses have, voted away moneys generously, liberally, lavishly. Handsome and magnificent sums have been voted away for causes much less meritorious and for services less of value and of far less importance than those performed by the carriers. In a few days more this House will proceed to consider the river and harbor appropriation bill. It will, no doubt, liberally, bountifully, and it is not too much to prophesy, extravagantly vote away the moneys of the people. But in the fullness of your bounty, in the exercise of your liberality, in the munificent distribution you will make of the public funds, I beseech you to do the right thing to the letter carriers. Be just to them, for justice to them is justice to the people.

If the proposed increase were extravagant, I should join in opposing it, for I am as much as any man can be opposed to wasteful extravagance of public moneys. I believe that governmental affairs should be economically administered, but economy does not mean meanness, it does not mean that employees should be underpaid. I desire this great Republic, this mighty nation of 80,000,000 people, this wonderfully progressive Government that now merits and receives the respect and challenges the admiration of the entire world to pay honest and fair wages to the men whose work for it has been properly and zealously performed, who never shrank from the performance of duty, who delivered the mail diligently and regularly, who unceasingly labor and work without murmur day in and day out, year in and year out, until worn out with service they must finally retire. There is no class of employees in the public service doing an equal amount of work who receive so little pay as the letter carriers.

So, then, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on behalf of these carriers, on behalf of the labor organizations who have espoused their cause, on behalf of the people in general who appreciate their magnificent work, on behalf of the city of New York, which contributes so largely to the public Treasury from its postal service, on behalf of that exceedingly large class of the community of every shade of political opinion and moving in every walk and sphere of life who believe in paying living wages for honest toil, I earnestly ask for a favorable consideration of my amendment increasing the pay of letter carriers. Let justice to them be no longer delayed, but deal with them fairly, manfully, and in a spirit of liberality becoming the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Just a word, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In opposition to the amendment?

Mr. SULZER. No; in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to recognize some one first in opposition to it.

Mr. SULZER. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SULZER. Just a few words, Mr. Chairman. For several years, as is well known, I have been talking and working day in and day out, week in and week out, month in and month out, in favor of some legislation that will do justice to the faithful and deserving letter carriers of our country. During all that time I have never been able definitely to find out just who was opposed to them and to their just and fair bill for an increase of pay by a graduated system of compensation based on efficient length of service.

Now, my colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] has offered the letter carriers' bill as an amendment to this bill, and if no objection is made it will be adopted and pass into law with the general appropriation bill. There have been cases where this has been done by the House, and I sincerely hope it will be done in this case, for a more worthy, honest, and commendable bill was never offered in the House of Representatives than this same letter-carriers' bill.

Several weeks ago I made a short speech in favor of it, and I would not address the House on the matter again to-day, especially after the able and eloquent remarks of my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], if it were not for the reason that this amendment now brings the matter in a new way before the House, and it can only be rejected by someone making a point of order against it. Every parliamentarian knows it is subject to a point of order.

I rise now to appeal to all my friends, to every man who believes in justice, to every man who loves fair play, to every man who has a spark of the fire of humanity in his breast, not to raise the point of order, to let the amendment be adopted. This amendment brings the question squarely before us. If you are in favor of doing justice to the letter carriers, you will not object and the amendment will become a law. This is the whole situation in a nutshell. I trust, therefore, as a friend of the letter carriers, that no member of this House will make a point of order against this amendment.

If you are in favor of the letter carriers' bill, if you believe in paying them decent wages, if you think the Government should pay them enough to support themselves and their families decently, if you believe they should live as men, as American citizens, ought to live, then you will raise no objection to this amendment; but if you are opposed to all this, to all I have said, I still plead that you make no objection at this time. Let the matter come up in the House in the regular way and give us a chance to get a roll call—to have an aye-and-nay vote—so that a record can be made and the country know who is in favor and who is against the letter carriers' bill. I think this is only fair.

It seems we can not get the committee to report the bill, and this is the only way to test the judgment of the House. Let us hope, then, that no member of this House, no Democratic member, no Republican member, no Populist member, will raise his voice against justice to the letter carriers by making a point of order against the amendment.

I want especially to appeal to the genial, courteous, able, and fearless chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from California, not to raise the point of order. Let us dispose of this question now——

Mr. LOUD. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. SULZER. I only have five minutes. Let us dispose of this question now by allowing the amendment to be adopted, and then if anyone is against it let him move to strike it out when the bill under consideration is reported to the House. That is the only way to get a vote—a record. If the gentleman wants to take a vote on the merits of this amendment, as I suggested, the friends of the bill are perfectly willing to vote on it when the bill comes up in the regular way in the House; but at this time I trust that no man who has any justice in his heart, who wants to be fair, who wants to do something for the men who work for the Government harder than any other class of men in this country—the letter carriers—I hope that this point of order will not be raised, and the amendment unceremoniously side tracked without giving us an opportunity to get an aye-and-nay vote.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is the bill supposed to raise their salaries?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Only $200 per annum after three years of service.

Mr. SULZER. That is all—a mere pittance. The Representatives from the cities ask for this simple act of fair play. We appeal to our colleagues from every section of the land to aid us in passing this bill for the letter carriers.

We representatives of the great cities of this country are generally broad gauged; we are not illiberal; we believe that the Government does not pay the letter carriers decent wages for honest work. The letter carriers work harder than any other class of employees of the Government. Sometimes they are obliged to work from ten to eighteen hours out of the twenty-four.

They are honest; they are industrious; they are faithful; they are courteous, and they toil day in and day out, in winter and in summer, in sunshine and in storm, night and day, in all kinds of weather. And yet, take them all in all, they are long-suffering, uncomplaining, and assiduous. How few of our citizens ever think of their trials, their wants, their health, and their little ones at home. Again and again I have watched them and sympathized with them—with their hopes and their sorrows.

I can not refrain from making this appeal in their behalf for simple justice. How I wish it were in my power to aid them, to pass and enact into law this bill they all want, they all pray for; this bill that is so fair and so just, that appeals to every right-thinking citizen in all the land, and that challenges adverse criticism. How much time and money we waste here for useless and worthless things! It is terrible when one soberly considers it all—and then, again, so much for the few, so little for the many.

How poorly, how miserably, the letter carriers are paid! Under the present law they do not, and can not, earn enough, no matter how long they have been in the service of the Government or how many hours a day they labor, to keep body and soul together. And what do they get? Not enough to economically support one man. It is a disgrace, a crying shame. Many of these letter carriers have wives and children—little homes—and these wives and children in many cases are to-day in want.

The head of the household does not get paid enough by the Government to live halfway decently. But it is not the Government's fault; it is the fault of a few men in Congress. I want to appeal to them in the name of justice and fair play, in the name of decency, that they do not object now to this amendment. Let it go to a vote in the House. The friends of the bill will abide by that decision, confident of the result. If we are defeated on the merits of the bill in the House, on an aye and nay vote, we shall not complain; but I predict that we will not, but that it will pass by an overwhelming majority. In my judgment at least two-thirds of the members of this House are in favor of this bill for the letter carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SULZER. I am very much obliged to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly; I am always glad to yield to the gentleman whom I hope will be the next governor of South Carolina. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman from New York has worked somewhat upon my sympathy [laughter] in picturing the hardships of these letter carriers and in telling us of the very hard work that they have to do. The question I want to ask is this: Is it not a fact that for every one appointed to these positions where they have to work so very, very hard, there are 25 other applicants, each of whom would be willing to accept the position?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I will not deny that may be the fact, and it may also be true that there are 25 applicants for the seat of every member in this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I do not hear anybody advocating an increase in the salaries of Congressmen, and I am opposed to the raising of any man's salary. I want to ask the gentleman again, is it not a fact that these carriers are working under the eight-hour system, notwithstanding you say they work twelve, fourteen, or fifteen hours?

Mr. SULZER. That is so, I believe, but the letter carriers often have to work overtime——

Mr. TALBERT. And are they not paid for all overtime that they work?

Mr. SULZER. The letter carriers are obliged to carry and distribute the mail so many times a day on their respective routes according to schedule, and if there are not enough men to do it in eight hours, then the letter carrier must work on and on until the mail is delivered, according to schedule, no matter if it takes ten, twelve, fourteen, sixteen, or eighteen hours out of the twenty-four.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask the gentleman if they do not get extra pay for this extra time they work, so that they get pay for all the work they do over eight hours; these hard-worked people who never resign and hardly ever die?

Mr. SULZER. I know my friend from South Carolina is in favor of economical government.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to do what is right.

Mr. SULZER. We know the gentleman does not want to spend a dollar of the people's money unless it is absolutely necessary. I agree with him in that. Because he stands for that principle of government, I commend him, not alone to his constituency, but to the country. I want to convince him, however, as I believe I have convinced many members of this House, that if there are any employees of this Government who work hard, who work faithfully, who are compelled to toil diligently day in and day out, who are honest and industrious at all times, and who, in my judgment, are the poorest paid, take it all in all, in the employ of the Government—they are the letter carriers; and I trust that the gentleman from South Carolina, in his magnanimity and love of justice, will not raise a point of order against this amendment.

I also desire to appeal to my good friend from California [Mr. LOUD], the chairman of the committee, who, in my judgment, is one of the hardest-worked men in this House, and who deserves great credit for what he has done for the postal service——

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if these carriers do not also get fifteen days leave of absence?

Mr. SULZER. Doubtless; but what of that? Most employees of the Government get twice as much; some a great deal more. But I am now appealing to the gentleman from California, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from California will not make a point of order against the amendment. Let us decide this matter on its merits, not on a technical rule of practice.

Let us pass this bill for the letter carriers. Let us be fair and just. Let us pay them decent wages. If this bill should become a law, it would cost the Government very little more money than at present, because this bill simply graduates the salaries according to length of service. It is in the nature of a just reward and a reasonable recognition for long and faithful performance of public duty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California insists on the point of order on the ground that the amendment involves a change of existing law. The Chair is of the opinion that that is the effect of the amendment, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from California is always ready to take the responsibility for his acts, but I am afraid in this matter he has assumed a greater responsibility than he imagines.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill (H. R. 11354) and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR SATURDAY.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, under the rules to-morrow would be private-pension day. The chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads informs me that he is very desirous of completing this bill to-morrow, and I send to the desk a request that Saturday, the 15th, may be substituted for to-morrow for the transaction of the business that would otherwise be in order under the rule to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submits the following request:

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Saturday, March 15, be substituted for Friday, March 14, for the consideration of private pension bills and bills removing charges of desertion under the order of December 2, 1901.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7432. An act granting a pension to Charles A. Shaefe;

SELDEN E. WHITCHER.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, this morning I moved that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4488) granting an increase of pension to Selden E. Whitcher. I did it under a misapprehension of the facts. I now move that the House reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire states that under a misapprehension this morning he asked for concurrence in an amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 4488. He now proposes to reconsider that vote. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I ask now that the House nonconcur and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. CALDERHEAD, Mr. RUMPLE, and Mr. NORTON.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The bill (S. 3743) granting an increase of pension to Frances Gurley Elderkin, formerly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART of New Jersey, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman withdraw that a moment?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

DEDICATION OF THE MONUMENT TO MARSHAL DE ROCHAMBEAU.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back to the House the House joint resolution 162 with amendments and with the recommendation that it do pass. I ask unanimous consent, by the instruction of the committee, to consider the joint resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reports back House joint resolution 162 and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General de Rochambeau an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the dedication of the monument of General de Rochambeau to be unveiled in the city of Washington.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General de Rochambeau, commander in chief of the French forces in America during the war of independence, a cordial invitation to unite with the Government and people of the United States in a fit and appropriate dedication of the monument of General de Rochambeau to be unveiled in the city of Washington on the 24th day of May, 1902; and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the word "General" and insert the word "Count."

In line 7, after the word "independence," insert the words "and to the family of Marquis de Lafayette."

Amend the title, as follows:

"Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France, and to the families of Count de Rochambeau and Marquis de Lafayette, an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the dedication of the monument of Count de Rochambeau, to be unveiled in the city of Washington."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. HITT. I would like to ask my colleague why Rochambeau's name was changed?

Mr. CANNON. Because I understand he was a count and not a general.

Mr. HITT. He was a marshal.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend, while I lived nearly back that far, that I defer to my friend's recollection about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITT. The only reason I state that is that that gentleman has once before been the guest of the United States. He was here when we had the celebration at Yorktown, and the resolution which has just been read is a copy of the resolution which was adopted at that time, inviting the Lafayettes and Rochambeaus to be here.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman would rather have it marshal, I have no objection.

Mr. HITT. He was a marshal.

Mr. CANNON. How does my friend want it?

Mr. HITT. These are the family or descendants of Marshal Rochambeau. That was his title when he commanded the troops.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. While the amendment is being fixed, I would like for the gentleman from Illinois to tell me—and I ask it in all seriousness—the reason for removing from the Hall of the House the fine picture that we had of Washington and of Lafayette that hung there on the wall?

Mr. McCLEARY. To give it a better position in the lobby.

Mr. HITT. I could not hear the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked why the picture of Lafayette had been removed from the Hall of the House, and also why the picture of Washington had been taken out of this Chamber.

Mr. HITT. I am glad to be able to state that we have a member of the House who is in charge of all objects of art and matters of esthetics—the gentleman from Illinois—my colleague. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois propose to amend his amendment?

Mr. CANNON. I am willing to accept the amendment offered by my colleague to strike out "General" and insert "Marshal."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wherever it occurs in the proposed amendment strike out the word "Count" and insert the word "Marshal."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend from Illinois in all seriousness why these pictures of Washington and Lafayette have been moved out of the Hall and put into the lobby?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that if there was no other reason, I think the removal is perfectly justified because it gives my friend an opportunity to challenge the removal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman in all seriousness. I do not see why we should let the light go out in the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor and then have these illustrious lights taken out of here. Now, I am satisfied that my distinguished friend is not going to live always; then what are we going to do?

Mr. CANNON. I still have hopes; my friend looks healthy. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The other amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the title will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. BEVERIDGE on the 11th ultimo, proposing to appropriate $2,500 for warden of the jail of the District of Columbia, to be paid under the direction of the Attorney-General, intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred Senate bills 246 and 1540, to report them adversely, a similar bill having been favorably reported and passed by the Senate. I ask that these bills be indefinitely postponed.

The bills were indefinitely postponed, as follows:

A bill (S. 246) to extend the provisions, limitations, and benefits of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892; and

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following amendment; which was read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. PENROSE to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States, viz:

Strike out all after the word "Constitution," in line 10, page 1, and insert as follows:

"SEC. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of at least two Senators from each State and one additional Senator for every ratio of 500,000 persons, who shall be elected by direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. A plurality of votes cast for candidates for Senator shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Vacancies in the representation of any State in the Senate shall be filled in the same manner as such vacancies are now filled in the case of vacancy in the House of Representatives.

"It shall be the duty of Congress, when fixing and apportioning Representatives from the several States in the House of Representatives after every census, to likewise fix and apportion the representation of Senators from each State in the Senate: Provided, That each State shall have at least two Senators.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution."

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that after the disposition of Senate bill 3653, for the protection of the President, etc., I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2960) to prohibit the coming into and to regulate the residence within the United States, its Territories, and all possessions and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese persons and persons of Chinese descent.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the Senator's proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania gives notice that following the unfinished business he will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Chinese-exclusion bill.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] gave notice the other day that following the anarchy bill, or the bill to protect the President, he would move to proceed to the consideration of the oleomargarine bill. I only wanted to remind the Senator of that notice.

Mr. PENROSE. I was aware of that fact.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to correct one phrase which the Senator from Wisconsin used. The bill which has been set down for a hearing after the shipping bill and has been popularly spoken of as the anarchy bill——

Mr. SPOONER. I changed that.

Mr. HOAR. I know—I understand the Senator from Wisconsin—but I wish to state that the bill does not in the least undertake to deal with the matter which I hope will be dealt with—the question of suppressing the carrying into practical effect of the doctrine of anarchy. It is a proposition to protect the life of the President of the United States against all forms of crime. Only one of the three assassinations has been by an anarchist.

LOCK IN THE DAM AT ROCK ISLAND, ILL.

Mr. MASON. I submit a concurrent resolution, and ask that it may be read and go to the Committee on Commerce.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to obtain from the Government engineers at Rock Island, Ill., a survey, estimate, and report as to the cost, necessity, and practicability of a lock in what is known as the dam between Sears Island and the main island of Rock Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. MASON. If it is in conformity with the rules I should be glad to have it adopted now, but I understand that under the rule it must be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not necessarily.

Mr. MASON. Then I ask unanimous consent, if it is the custom, that the resolution be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read, but it will be read again.

Mr. MASON. It is for a preliminary survey and estimate.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Is it not customary for the Committee on Commerce to consider these propositions for surveys and embody them in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. MASON. I will state for the information of the Senator from Maine that it is the custom to pass them, I understand, and they have passed when presented by other Senators, when the resolution simply requests information as a basis, so that it may be reported in time to go in the river and harbor bill if the Secretary of War recommends it. I hope the Senator from Maine will not object. The resolution has been passed.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to this project if it is simply a preliminary inquiry.

Mr. MASON. There is no appropriation that goes with it.

Mr. HALE. I know; but the question is whether the Department shall make a survey preliminary to an appropriation. The river and harbor bills are full of such provisions. The Presiding Officer is chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He knows what the ordinary custom has been. I make no point on this matter as against the ordinary course pursued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution does provide for a survey.

Mr. HALE. Not simply an inquiry, but a survey.

Mr. MASON. One resolution does and the other does not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears that the resolution which has been read does not make that requirement. It simply requires a report to be made upon what has already been done.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be considered as agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MASON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made on the east bank of the Mississippi River, commencing at the city of Quincy and running along the east bank of the Mississippi River to Sny Levee, with a view to improving navigation by preventing the water from overflowing the natural and artificial banks along that part of the river and deepening the channel.

SEC. 2. That sufficient money is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry this resolution into effect.

HEARING ON PURE-FOOD BILLS.

Mr. MCCUMBER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer to report the hearing before said committee on the pure-food bills now pending before it, said stenographer to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS ON ISTHMIAN CANAL ROUTES.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the testimony taken on the hearings before the Committee and sub-Committees on Interoceanic Canals be printed for the use of the Senate, and that 100 copies thereof be bound in cloth for the use of Senators.

2. That the chairman of said committee shall cause to be prepared a table of contents and an index of said hearings, and also a table of contents and an index to the appendices to the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, heretofore ordered by the Senate to be printed, to accompany such hearings and documents.

Mr. HALE. I hope we may now proceed with the Calendar, unless some Senator desires to address the Senate upon the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio gave notice that he will address the Senate on the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Ohio excuse the Chair for one moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

SELDEN E. WHITCHER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4488) granting an increase of pension to Selden E. Whitcher, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CARMACK were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 3261) authorizing the Eldorado and Bastrop Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Ouachita River, in the State of Arkansas; and

EDWARD KERSHNER.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the concurrent resolution from the House requesting the return of a bill which has been sent to the President may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill H. R. 5224, an act providing for the relief of Edward Kershner.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the debate on this bill is already quite extended. It has been, I think I can safely say, as thorough and as fair and quite as exhaustive a debate as any I have seen since I have been a member of this body. I very much doubt if there can be said at this time anything on either side that will excite interest or be profitable to this discussion. Under such circumstances, one might very well forego his privilege of participating in the debate, and I have been very strongly inclined to do so. And yet it has occurred to me that I shall feel better satisfied if, in addition to casting my vote for this measure, as I intend to do, I shall also take advantage of this opportunity to briefly, at least, express the views that impel me to that action.

In the first place, before taking up this measure to discuss it on its merits, I want to frankly say that I am not entirely satisfied with it. My lack of satisfaction is due to the fact that ever since I first had occasion to investigate the condition of our merchant marine and to study the question of its restoration, I have been clearly and unqualifiedly of the opinion that the best and most equitable and most scientific and satisfactory way to accomplish that object, so far, at least, as our freight-carrying vessels are concerned, would be to reinaugurate the policy of discriminating duties, under which, in the earlier days of the Republic, our fathers made our merchant marine the pride and the boast of every American.

I know what the objections are to a return to that policy. They were stated briefly but very forcibly by the Senator having the bill in charge when he opened this debate.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me? Mr. President, I ask that there may be order in the Chamber. There is such a buzz of conversation that while we can hear the Senator, of course, it very much interferes with the satisfaction of hearing him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. FORAKER. I was just saying, before the Senator from Georgia kindly interrupted me, and I thank him for it, that the objections to a return to the policy of discriminating duties were well stated by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator having this bill in charge, in his opening speech when he presented the measure to the Senate. They are that there are commercial treaties—34 of them, I think he said—which stand in the way, and if we should return to that policy it is contended that we would incite retaliatory measures that would do us more harm than a pursuit of the policy would do us good.

So far as the treaties are concerned, they all provide by their terms for their abrogation upon notice, so that as a practical question there is no difficulty there. So far as retaliation is concerned, it is a matter of speculation what the result would be in that regard. I would not fear it. I do not see how those who carry to-day more than 90 per cent of our foreign commerce could very seriously retaliate upon the less than 10 per cent that we carry in American bottoms.

But, Mr. President, I do not refer to this policy for the purpose of discussing it. I refer to it simply in justice to my own record on this subject. It is a matter of no consequence to any other Senator here, but it is a matter of a good deal of satisfaction to me that I be consistent with myself. I have had occasion to speak frequently on this subject in public, and I have uniformly expressed the view, and contended for it, that I have just now announced. One notable occasion when I contended for that view was at the national Republican convention in 1896, when I happened to be a member of the committee on resolutions and assisted in the framing of a plank which made that proposition Republican policy.

But, Mr. President, although I am still of that view, I have found during my service here in the Senate that it is an idle thing to undertake to legislate so as to provide for a return to the policy of discriminating duties. When you want to accomplish something by legislation in a parliamentary body, it is highly important that you have a majority in favor of the proposition, and there is not a majority here in favor of it; but, on the contrary, I have learned after very diligently addressing myself to this subject that there is a majority of the contrary opinion.

Therefore I put the policy of discriminating duties aside as impossible, and that being impossible I look for the next best thing, and in my opinion we have it in the subsidy measure that is presented by this bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he means that there has ever been any expression by this body on that question. I have no knowledge of any such expression.

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. TELLER. We have some of us wanted to vote for it, but we never had an opportunity.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean that there had ever been any expression by this body. I simply mean that having a good deal of interest in this subject in a general way I have taken occasion to find out the views of other Senators, particularly my colleagues on the Republican side, and I know that they are generally of the opinion, for the reasons expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to which I referred, that a return to the policy of discriminating duties would be impracticable; and, therefore, if we are to aid the merchant marine at all we must aid it in some other way, and this is the way which, in their judgment, is most practicable.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose, then, the Senator means simply to say that the Republicans of this body are opposed to that system.

Mr. FORAKER. I simply mean to say that in my belief a majority of the Republican members of the Senate are of the opinion that a return to the policy of discriminating duties is impracticable for the reasons mentioned, because of the commercial treaties that stand in the way and because of the fear they have that there would be retaliation upon our merchant marine.

Mr. TELLER. Notwithstanding the platform of 1896?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, it may be that I ought to take upon myself a good part of that responsibility. I happened to be chairman of the committee on resolutions. I am so constituted by nature that I must have rather positive views, if I have any at all, on any subject in which I become interested. I had given some attention to that subject and I had views about it. That was my view, and I contended for it in the committee. I think the Senator from Colorado, who was a member of the subcommittee and assisted in the framing of that plank, will well remember what I refer to and that I was very contentious about it.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say, if it does not interfere with the Senator, that I recollect very well the effort the Senator made on that occasion, and it seemed then to be the sentiment, as I supposed, of the Republican party, at least so far as the committee was concerned. I joined with him in the desire to return to those duties, believing myself that, as he says, it would restore our foreign commerce.

Mr. FORAKER. All I wanted to say, Mr. President, was that I have not changed my view about that policy. But what I want is a restoration of the merchant marine, and if I can not get it in one way because a majority of this body think that way is impracticable, if I can not induce them to accept my opinion and my judgment, then I am willing to do the next best thing and accept their opinion and their judgment as to what is most practicable and what is the best way to accomplish this object.

I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce. I do not know all that has occurred in that committee room, but I do know that the members of that committee are capable men and patriotic men. I know that they are interested in this subject. I know that they have given years of study and thought to it, and I know that some of them have been attempting to legislate about it for many years. I am disposed, therefore, when they do not accept my view, rather than have everything come to naught, to accept their view, which in all probability is the wiser view.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I am here not contending for what I think would be the best way to restore the merchant marine, but to contend for the way proposed by the Committee on Commerce in the bill which they have reported to us.

Now, this is a bill which provides for restoring the merchant marine by a grant of subsidies. We heard a good deal about this only yesterday. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] made one of his usually eloquent and impassioned addresses to the Senate. He told us that the proposition of this measure to pay subsidies was class legislation; that it was in violation of that spirit of equality to all classes which was at the bottom of our Constitution and our institutions, and he had a great deal to say as to who are to be the beneficiaries of this measure if it shall be enacted into a law.

Mr. President, I am not surprised to hear the Senator from Arkansas talking about this being class legislation, for the Senator from Arkansas belongs to a school of American statesmen who have been talking about class legislation whenever we have undertaken to protect and develop an industry during the last hundred years. Ever since the beginning of our Government, ever since we have undertaken by legislation to protect and foster and develop industries in this country, there have been men to stand up and oppose it—honestly, sincerely, no doubt—upon the ground that it was an effort to take the money of the people out of the common Treasury and put it into the pockets of some favored class who were to get the benefit of it.

We can all remember within the time of the Senator from Arkansas how we had to meet here in the halls of Congress and all over the United States the same contention when we wanted to levy a tariff duty for the development of the iron industry in this country. They told us it was class legislation; that we were but undertaking to take money out of the pockets of the people and put it into the pockets of the ironmasters of the country; that we were robbing the farmers and we were robbing the laboring men. They said the same thing when we undertook to protect the steel industry, the glass industry, the tin-plate industry, and every other industry that we have legislated about for the purpose of protecting it and fostering and developing it. Now, when we undertake to legislate about this industry, they make the same contention. There is nothing new in it. In the language of patent law, it is not invention but only "a new use of an old article." We are entirely familiar with all that the Senator said, and know from long experience how to appreciate it.

Therefore, Mr. President, I want to say at the beginning that in favoring a proposition that provides that the Government shall pay subsidies for the restoration of our merchant marine I do not regard myself as favoring class legislation in the sense in which that contention was made yesterday by the Senator from Arkansas any more than we were favoring class legislation when we enacted the protective tariff law, under which the prosperity that came with the Republican party in 1860 was set into operation and by virtue of which legislation it has continued ever since. It was not class legislation to provide that we should develop our own resources, that we should vary our industries, that we should employ our labor, that we should have home markets. That was not for the benefit alone of the ironmaster, or the steel manufacturer, or the tin-plate manufacturer, or any other particular class.

In the presence of the magnificent results we have witnessed all ought to be able to see that instead of this having been class legislation it was legislation that has benefited all classes and all sections alike, for the prosperity that has come to our people is a prosperity which all enjoy, which is not limited to any class or any section or any part of this country. And as, Mr. President, when we were legislating to develop these home industries, when we were legislating to establish home markets, we were legislating for the benefit of the farmer as well as for the benefit of the manufacturer, so is it true that now, legislating to restore our merchant marine, we are not legislating for a single class, but we are legislating for the benefit of all the people of the United States, for the farmers and the wage workers of our country as much as for any other class. They are not the direct beneficiaries in the sense that the money will be paid to them, but they are the direct beneficiaries in the sense that they will share in the benefits that are to be derived from having a merchant marine.

Before I pass from that I want to call attention to another statement made by the Senator from Arkansas on yesterday. He told us in the course of his remarks not only that this was class legislation, but that the beneficiaries of this class legislation would be the purchasers of the Leyland, the White Star, and the other lines referred to; and in that behalf the Senator caused to be sent to the desk and read and incorporated into the RECORD an article from the New York Journal of Commerce, in which there was a very extended and rather sensational account of a purchase by American capitalists of a number of foreign steamship lines. I have the article before me and will refer to it. The lines said to be purchased were the White Star, the American Line to Southampton, the Red Star Line to Antwerp, the Leyland Line to Liverpool, the Atlantic Transport Line to London, the Dominion to Liverpool and London, and the Mediterranean from Boston.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know whether all these lines have been purchased by these capitalists or not. I have no information on that subject other than the Senator seemed to have, and he did not seem to have any except what he got from this newspaper article. I do know that the Leyland Line has been purchased; that is, I know it in the sense that I have been officially informed to that effect, as every other member of the Senate has been, in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation—that is, I believe, his title—Mr. Chamberlain, who has been quite frequently referred to in the course of these debates on both sides. In his annual report he tells us that Mr. Morgan and his associates purchased the Leyland Line and they are now its owners. I do not know whether any other line has been purchased or not.

But, Mr. President, let us stop and consider what of it if there have been other purchases. In the first place, it is not possible for the purchasers of those lines to get any benefit whatever for those lines or any ship in those lines under the bill now under consideration. The ships belonging to those lines are all foreign built and heretofore have been foreign owned.

Mr. BERRY. Not all of them, Mr. President. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Of course.

Mr. BERRY. It was alleged that Mr. Morgan bought the American Line, that is the line belonging to the International Navigation Company.

Mr. FORAKER. That is already an American line. That would not change the situation.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator said all the lines were foreign lines. He was mistaken in that statement.

Mr. FORAKER. I said all the lines I mentioned were foreign lines. I was not speaking of the American Line. I will speak of that presently.

Mr. BERRY. But the Senator read the name of that line, too.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not intend to do so. I intended simply to call attention to what this article said as to foreign lines. So far as those lines are concerned, every one of them is a foreign line except the American Line, and every ship in those lines is foreign built and has been heretofore a foreign-owned ship, and is now a foreign-built ship but American owned.

That being the case, this bill can not, if it becomes a law, be of the slightest benefit to the owners of these lines. The Senator from Arkansas was mistaken, therefore, when he said Mr. Morgan and his associates, as these purchasers, were to be the beneficiaries of the legislation. The bill itself conclusively answers that claim.

In the bill as it has been amended, on page 6, occurs this provision under "Title II, general subsidy:"

SEC. 6. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1902, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, subject to the provisions of this title, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the owner or owners of any vessel hereafter built and registered in the United States or now duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States, etc.

So, Mr. President, the benefits of this bill are confined to vessels hereafter built and vessels now duly registered. These foreign lines can not be hereafter built and they are not now duly registered or otherwise. Therefore by the terms of this bill they are absolutely barred out from all participation in the benefits of this subsidy, and properly so.

But, Mr. President, I want now the attention of the Senators. What does it signify that Mr. Morgan and his associates have bought the Leyland Line, as we know they have, according to the official report before us, and what does it signify, if it be true, that they have also recently bought these other lines, as has been stated? What is the significance of it? It has an impressive lesson for us. It has been referred to here in this Chamber in the course of this debate as though some great crime had been committed. Mr. President, I will not say a great crime, but I will say a great offense has been committed; but it has not been committed by the men who purchased these lines. It has been committed—and it is putting it not too strongly for me to say it—it has been committed by the Congress of the United States, and, in large part, here in this Chamber.

When did Mr. Morgan buy these lines? I am not here to defend him; it is not necessary; but I am here to defend this measure. He bought these lines in May, 1901, after the Congress had adjourned without taking action on the bill providing subsidies for the merchant marine and providing otherwise for its restoration. That bill failed of favorable consideration in the Senate, fell to the ground, and Congress adjourned; and when it fell to the ground the last hope fell to the ground with it of the men who wanted to invest capital in an American merchant marine to carry our products to the markets of the world; and when we had made it impossible, by failing to legislate, for them to safely invest capital in American ships to sail under the American flag, they of necessity looked elsewhere for the ships they needed. We have no right to complain of their action, for it was our inaction that drove them to it. They went and bought the Leyland Line, and perhaps since they have bought these other lines. I should not be at all surprised to hear the report confirmed. It is only what we might expect.

Mr. President, suppose the Congress of the United States had refused to impose tariff duties on the importation into this country of steel rails, what would have been the consequence? We would have gone on building railroads, but we would have bought our steel rails in England manufactured by English labor, thus constituting a home market for the English farmer; we would have bought them there and we would have been driven to that; but the Congress, instead of refusing to protect that industry, protected it, and, as a result, our steel mills were started in this country, and steel rails were manufactured here by American workmen, who were fed by American farmers, and from our own mills our railroads supplied their wants. But as in that case we would have driven our railroads to purchase rails from Great Britain if we had not made a home supply possible, so is it that failing to make American ships possible we drive those needing them to buy them abroad.

It is the same question precisely, only occurring in a different form. We want ships; we have not got them. What is the reason? We do not lack capital. We have got more capital to be employed in that way, or in any other way that is profitable, than any other country on the face of the earth. We have the ablest and most capable business men to handle that capital. We all desire a merchant marine, not only because of the benefit it will be to us, but because of the pride we take in seeing our flag floating over the seas upon American vessels. We have not got the ships. What is the trouble? Our capitalists can not, because of the increased cost of construction and the increased cost of operation, safely invest in the building of ships and in their navigation.

That is the whole of it, and the Congress of the United States, year after year for twenty years now having this matter almost constantly under consideration, has failed to come to the rescue of this great industry. As a result of it all, men who can no longer do without ships—men who would want to invest their capital in ships of American build and have the American flag float over them—are driven, in order that they may conserve the great business interests with which they are identified, to go abroad and spend their millions in making purchases of steamship lines from the British, instead of spending their millions in the shipyards of the United States. That is the whole of it. Who suffers, or, rather, who does not suffer?

Mr. President, I say that the only offense that has been committed has been committed by this body—I mean by the Congress of the United States—and that is an offense against every shipyard in this country, against the mechanics of this country, against the farmers of this country, against the whole people of this country, who are interested not only in a business point of view but in a patriotic sense in seeing our merchant marine restored.

I do not know what purchases Mr. Morgan has made beyond the Leyland Line, but I do know that I am not at all surprised to hear that he has made that purchase, and that he has probably made the other purchases which have been referred to. It is just what should have been expected. If we had not protected our industries, established and developed them here under a protective-tariff policy, we would not have had them here; they would have been across the water. And just so it is, that so long as you refuse to make it safe and profitable to invest capital in an American merchant marine, so long shall we not have one, and our capital will be invested, as it has been in this instance, in the purchase of lines that belong to foreigners.

Mr. President, I am not going into the details of this measure. I want to continue to speak of it in the general, broad way in which I have been trying to speak of it. I have said that the reason these purchases of foreign lines have been made is that we have not done our duty to the merchant marine of this country, and I have said that the reason legislation is necessary is because we are at a disadvantage on account of the difference in the cost of construction and the difference in the cost of operation between this and other countries.

Well, now, when I say that, I am at once told by Senators on the other side that this, that, and the other man has made a statement to the contrary, and that is true. They have cited and put into the RECORD one statement after another—not a great many in the aggregate, but quite a number—to the effect that we can build ships in this country as cheaply as they can be built anywhere else, and that we can operate them as cheaply, and therefore there is no necessity for any subsidy. On the other hand, there are statements quite equal in number, quite equal in positiveness, to just the opposite effect. Let the statements offset the one the other. They are only opinions at best. But there are some statements of fact that show conclusively, Mr. President, the necessity for coming to the rescue of our merchant marine if we would restore it to anything like its former greatness, to anything like the proportions it should have.

What I have just been talking about is a most conclusive argument. Why have Mr. Morgan and his associates made these investments and expended millions in ships built abroad, to be navigated under the flags of other nations, subject to all the disadvantages in consequence? Why, if they want ships, would they not rather invest their money at home in the extension of our shipyards, in the employment of our mechanics, in the construction of an American merchant marine to be sailed under our own flag? Why, Mr. President, the fact that they would submit to the disadvantage of investing their capital under foreign flags, instead of under our own, is of itself, I say, conclusive evidence that there is a controlling reason for it, and the only reason for it that anyone has suggested is the fact that they can not invest their capital safely in American ships.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator if he means by his emphasis on the fact that they are flying another flag over these ships to have us understand that they can not fly the American flag over them if they see fit to do so?

Mr. FORAKER. They can not, as I understand it.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the contrary, and the Senator will find it so laid down in the regulations. They can not document the vessel or have it placed under American registry, but they may fly any flag they may see fit, and they can fly ours if they want to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. That may be true. I have not looked at the statute to know what its provisions are, but it never occurred to me that the American flag could be floated over any ship that was foreign built and not documented in America and admitted to American registry. If I am in error, I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senater will look at the regulations, which he will find in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, he will find what I have said to be the fact.

Mr. FORAKER. So let it be.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing to prevent an American citizen from flying the American flag over any ship he owns no matter where it is documented.

Mr. HANNA. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. If a portion of the stock of such a corporation is owned by American citizens and the balance by foreigners, how would it be about the flag?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think it would make any difference.

Mr. HANNA. It would take a majority of the stock to determine under what flag the ship should be sailed.

Mr. TELLER. The rule is that a corporation gets its character largely from the place where it is incorporated, but where a majority of the stock in a corporation is owned by American citizens we treat it as an American corporation.

Mr. HANNA. As to the question of the flag, it would take a majority of the stock to control.

Mr. TELLER. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] who has the floor but I shall later present some facts regarding this matter. If Mr. Morgan has bought the majority of that stock, as I understand he and other citizens of the United States have done, they can fly the American flag from those vessels, or the Belgium flag, or the English flag, or any other flag they see fit, but they can not document the vessel or register in this country.

Mr. HANNA. But if they have the American flag at their peak they will have to pay American wages, which are from 25 to 30 per cent more than the wages paid in other countries, though it is not an American ship.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know how it is as to the flag. That is a statutory provision as to which I had not the thoughtfulness to consult the statute. I supposed the flag went with the registry and that unless a ship was regularly documented as an American ship it could not carry the flag. But it is true, notwithstanding all that has been suggested by the Senator's interruption, that these foreign lines can not be documented and can not be registered as American ships and they can not, therefore, have the benefit of our navigation laws, and that is the point of importance——

Mr. SPOONER. The Supreme Court of the United States decided a great many years ago that a ship owned by a corporation not an American corporation was not a ship of the United States within the meaning of the navigation laws.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I was referring to this purchase as a fact which of itself is the strongest evidence that I can think of why these gentlemen could not successfully invest their money under existing conditions in American shipping.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I call his attention to the regulations, which he will find on page 418 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation, where the statement is made unequivocally that an American citizen may fly the American flag upon a vessel if he sees fit. I assert, after some examination, that there is not any law anywhere which I can find against it, and if there is, I have overlooked it, and so has the Treasury Department.

Mr. FORAKER. I read what I understand the Senator from Colorado to call my attention to—regulation No. 347, on page 418 of the Report of the Commissioner of Navigation:

347. Right to fly the flag.—The privilege of carrying the flag of the United States is under the regulation of Congress, and it may have been the intention of that body that it should be used only by regularly documented vessels—

That is what I supposed—

No such intention, however, is found in any statute. And as a citizen is not prohibited from purchasing and employing abroad a foreign ship, it is regarded as reasonable and proper that he should be permitted to fly the flag of his country as an indication of ownership and for the due protection of his property. The practice of carrying the flag by such vessels is now established. The right to do so will not be questioned, and it is probable that it would be respected by the courts.

I am glad to find something in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation that is cited with approbation on the other side in this debate. I am very glad, indeed, and I feel very much obliged to the Senator from Colorado for calling my attention to it. I was not aware of the regulation.

Mr. TELLER. I would cite something more, if it would not interrupt the Senator, that he may not have heard of, and shall do so before the debate is concluded.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator knows that I never complain of interruptions. I am quite glad to be interrupted, particularly when I am in error about anything.

I did not suppose that vessels not documented and not under American registry had the right to fly the American flag; but the fact remains, and it is an important fact, that they have no right to register these ships, no right to invoke the protection of our navigation laws in their favor. But my contention is, they would not willingly do the thing they had done, and that, in view of the fact that they have done it, we have an argument that seems to me to be controlling, to the effect that they have invested capital there because it is not profitable, or at least not equally so, to invest it here.

Now, I want to call attention to some other facts. I do not want to call attention to anybody's opinion. One man can indulge in conjecture as well as another, but facts, when they are indisputable, speak for themselves and can not be contradicted.

I call attention to a letter, which has already been put in the RECORD in the progress of this debate, but which ought to go into the RECORD again, and which ought to be made familiar to everybody in this country who takes an interest in this subject. I refer to the letter of Mr. B. N. Baker, president of the Atlantic Transport Line. I want to read it, in order that it may appear in my remarks in the RECORD:

ATLANTIC TRANSPORT LINE, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Baltimore, October 17, 1901.

DEAR MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Referring to my letter of March 16, 1901, and replying to your request with regard to relative difference in cost of ships, our company at present have a contract for two ships with Messrs. Harland & Wolff, Limited, Belfast (one of which will be completed very early in the spring, and the other a little later, say during the summer), of exactly the same size, dimensions, and all particulars as two ships we have contracted for with the New York Shipbuilding Company, of Camden.

The cost of the English-built ship, as near as possible (we having just completed two of exactly the same size, dimensions, and speed), will be about £292,000 ($1,419,120). The same identical ship built at the works of the New York Shipbuilding Company will cost us a little over £380,000 ($1,846,800).

More than $400,000 additional cost.

In addition to this, we are building two steamers with the New York Shipbuilding Company of smaller dimensions, for which we have a contract, at £150,000 each ($729,000). Also two ships of exactly the same dimensions with the Maryland Steel Company, Sparrows Point, for £150,000 each ($729,000). We have two ships of identically the same detail, delivered to us in the last twelve months, built by Messrs. Harland & Wolff, Belfast, one of which cost us £110,000 ($534,600) and the other £100,000 ($486,000).

Yours, very truly,

B. N. BAKER, President.

EUGENE T. CHAMBERLAIN, Esq.,
Commissioner of Navigation, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, that is nobody's opinion—that is nobody's conjecture. There is an actual fact. Here is the president of a great steamship company seeking to do the best he possibly can in the administration of his trust for his stockholders. He has ships built abroad and ships built in this country, of identically the same dimensions, the same plans, the same specifications throughout. What is the result? In the first case he gives there is a difference of more than $400,000 in favor of the construction abroad, the cost there being that much less than the cost here in this country.

In the other case, as against $729,000 for a ship built in this country of identically the same dimensions and identically the same character in every respect as one built abroad, he paid but $534,000. As to the other case, he paid $729,000 in this country and he paid $486,000 in Belfast. These figures need no comment.

It is argued that because we can send locomotives abroad and sell them in successful competition with locomotive builders abroad, that therefore we ought to construct ships as cheaply here as they are constructed abroad. That argument is not sound, because it overlooks the fact that locomotives are built in large numbers and to standard size. There is no difficulty therefore about their construction, and the cost of labor upon a locomotive can be cheapened on that account far beyond what you can cheapen the cost of labor on a ship which is not built according to a standard.

But I want to avoid opinion and speculation and rely on facts. Therefore, notwithstanding the criticisms that were made by the Senator from Arkansas of Mr. Griscom, I want to read now a statement made by him which I find to be reported by the Commissioner of Navigation. It is to the same effect. I find it at page 47 of the Commissioner's report. He says:

If we had built these two ships, the St. Louis and St. Paul, in Great Britain instead of the United States we could have procured them for $1,100,000 less money than we had to pay for them.

It was some time ago when these ships were built, and some time ago when he made that statement; as long ago as when he testified before the Committee on Commerce, two or three years ago perhaps, but the fact remains that whenever it was, whether four or five years ago or longer, when these ships were built they cost $1,100,000 more for their construction in this country than they would have cost had they been constructed abroad. I know Mr. Griscom and know his statement is reliable. In addition to what he says, we have the fact undisputed and indisputable, given by Mr. Baker, the president of the other company, that only last year he was compelled to pay at the rate of 25 or 30 per cent more for the construction of ships in this country than he could have secured their construction for abroad.

So it seems to me it is pretty well established by such facts as these—and I might cite many others, but I do not want to detain the Senate unduly—not by somebody's opinion, not by somebody's argument, somebody's reasoning, but by facts of which men engaged in this business tell us, that it costs 25 to 30 per cent more to construct ships in this country, notwithstanding all our facilities, than it does to construct them abroad.

Now, what about the operation of the ships? I do not know where the Committee on Commerce got the data which they have embodied in their report, but they have given us some very instructive facts, which I have no doubt are absolutely reliable. At any rate these facts are given us by our committee, and we are under every proper obligation to accept them. They tell us, at page 21 of their report, about wages, for I do not intend to spend any more time on the question of the cost of construction. I come now to the question of the operation, the navigation of the ships. They say:

Based on an examination of the monthly pay rolls of 20 ocean steamers in foreign trade—American, British, German, and Norwegian, ranging from small cargo steamers to the highest types of trans-Atlantic mail steamers—the total monthly pay roll of 1,508 men of all ratings on American steamers is $56,116; of 1,504 men on British steamers is $39,202, and of 1,507 men on German and Scandinavian steamers is $27,047. The average monthly pay is thus: American, $37.21; British, $26.07; German and Scandinavian, $17.95.

Now, Mr. President, in the face of facts of this character, gathered from actual experience officially reported to us, it seems to me there is no room to argue about the cost relatively of navigating our ships under our flag. We have this result laid before us—why should we not accept it? It is the only explanation that has been given, that anybody has attempted to give, of why it is that we have not a merchant marine—that we are at a disadvantage in our competition with the merchant marines of other countries.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FORAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. VEST. From the table the Senator has just read, which has been emphasized by the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, if foreign-built ships were given to the people of the United States they could not run them on account of the difference in wages on foreign ships and our own ships. Will he be kind enough to tell us why it is that England, paying the largest wages upon the ocean, except those of the United States, to-day commands 53 per cent of the carrying trade of the world, and that Germany, France, and Norway, paying much less wages, as shown by the very table which the Senator has quoted, are unable even to approximate the supremacy of Great Britain?

Mr. FORAKER. It is not necessary for the purposes of this debate or in the consideration of this measure to explain why there should be a difference in the wages paid by Great Britain and Norway and other countries, and that there should yet be success, notwithstanding higher wages, in the development of the British merchant marine. I can say this, however. We all know from reason, as a matter of fact, that there can not be successful competition where there are disadvantages for the one party to labor under unless such disadvantages be overcome by a countervailing advantage of some kind or another. I have not studied this question as to relative conditions in foreign countries. I do not know why, therefore, if it be true, as the Senator has stated, that France and Norway and other countries have an advantage over Great Britain in the matter of wages, Great Britain can yet successfully compete with them in her merchant marine. But if there were any propriety in it, I could suggest a great many reasons that occur to me on the spur of the moment why Great Britain, mistress of the sea for generations, with her great merchant marine, retains her advantage in spite of the disadvantages to which the Senator from Missouri refers.

I am speaking of the practical situation here in America. Why is it that Senators are unwilling to receive, as the explanation for the absence of an American marine, the explanation which has been given by the committee? Why is it that they are unwilling to accept for that explanation the facts for which indisputable figures are offered, that there is a difference in the cost of labor in this country, whether in the construction of the ship or in the navigation of the ship?

Now, that brings me to another feature of this bill. It has been said in this debate that masters of vessels have a right in every port to employ their crew; that they can take Chinese or Japanese; that they can take anybody. In a sense, that is true; but one purpose of this bill looks to the national defense, to the establishment of auxiliary cruisers, and in that behalf to the making of a nursery for seamen, and therefore it is provided, not only that the ships which carry the mails shall be suitable to be converted into cruisers, but that one-fourth of the crew for the first two years, I believe it is, shall be Americans, 33⅓ per cent Americans after two years, for the next three years and after that 50 per cent of the crew shall be Americans.

You can not have two rates of wages for men who work alongside of each other. If you are going to have 25 per cent of your crew Americans, you will have to pay American wages to that portion of your crew, and if you pay American wages to 25 per cent of your crew you will have to pay American wages to the whole of your crew; and so from the beginning in considering this matter you have to depend upon it that when you come to man your vessels after they have been put in commission, when you come to select your crew in this way, although you may be allowed to employ three-fourths of your crew from other countries who would be willing to accept lower wages under other circumstances, for the reason I have indicated, you will have to pay them all American wages. There is not, therefore, any advantage in the matter of wages, even if it be true that you can ship the crew in any port.

Now, Mr. President, I do not care to go into the detail of this bill. That I leave to the judgment of the committee. But I wish nevertheless to say a word or two as to some of the provisions. The committee have seen fit to amend the law of 1891 in some particulars. They have been criticised for doing it. I think they are to be commended for doing it.

The first criticism is that they "direct" the Postmaster-General instead of simply empowering him to make these contracts. We do not want a Postmaster-General exercising a discretion in this matter. We want our mail carried on lines such as this bill undertakes to provide for, and we want to have the Postmaster-General directed to do it, so that he may not consider it an optional matter with him as one Postmaster-General did, and not proceed under the bill to take the action which it is desired he shall take.

Another provision of the law which is to be amended is that which provides for the payment of the subsidy at so much per mile. The amendment is that it shall be paid according to tonnage. The purpose of that is explained by the committee in their report. It was explained by the chairman who presented the bill to the Senate. It is a good purpose. The purpose is to encourage a larger tonnage, the building of larger vessels. If you pay only so much per mile, there is no inducement to increase the tonnage. If you pay by the ton, then everyone who takes a contract of this character is interested in having the larger tonnage which modern wants require.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator speaks of the improvement of the present bill in the fact that the discretion is taken, as alleged by him, from the Postmaster-General. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the discretion is now almost entirely lodged with the Postmaster-General, and to ask him whether, in view of his commendation of the taking away of that discretion from the Postmaster-General, the pending bill is not so defective in this regard as to call from him or from some other a proper amendment in this respect. I will read it, with his permission.

Mr. FORAKER. Is it as to routes?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir. I will read it, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to enter into contracts, for a term not less than five nor more than fifteen years in duration, with American citizens for the carrying of mails on American steamships between ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment, having regard to the national defense, will best subserve and promote the postal, commercial, and maritime interests of the United States.

Now, the Senator will observe that the bill gives to the Postmaster-General the absolute discretion as to what routes shall be selected upon which the vessels shall be run with which these contracts shall be made. I have thought and still think that this bill is very gravely defective in that regard, and that we ought to do as I understand the British Government does, and if the bill should become a law the routes should be specified; and not only should the routes be specified, but the character and the magnitude of the service should be specified. This is a discretion which ought not to be lodged in any single man, but it should be prescribed by Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. The point made by the Senator from Georgia had not escaped me. I would have been better satisfied with this bill, I will frankly state, if it had specified the routes and established them. Then we would have known precisely what was going to be established. What we want is the establishment of the lines recommended in the report. I wish that part of the report were a part of the bill, but I was not disposed to criticise the committee, for I can understand very well how they might conclude, thinking the matter over, that that was a matter of detail which they could safely intrust to the Postmaster-General.

He is not an indefinite somebody. He is a distinguished and capable officer of the Government, charged with a great responsibility, and in all my time, as far back as I can recollect, we have never had a Postmaster-General to whom it would not have been safe to intrust that discretion. I do not know what the Postmaster-General will do in regard to it, but the Senator can not have any debate with me over that suggestion. I, after thinking it over, concluded that the committee had taken that view of it. I can understand well why they should take it. If they had put in the bill a provision for certain specific lines, Senators would have taken exception, possibly, if not to all, to some of them. It might have been said, "better leave that to the official who will be charged with the duty of executing the law, who will take time to look into the matter and act upon his judgment and responsibility."

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In order that I may not be misunderstood by acquiescing without any reply to what the Senator says in reference to the capacity of the present Postmaster-General and other Postmasters-General, I do not mean in any wise to reflect upon the capacity and integrity of either the present or any other Postmaster-General, but I do mean to say most emphatically that not only has there never been a Postmaster-General since the foundation of the Government who ought to be intrusted with such power as this bill gives, but I do not think the man has ever existed since the foundation of the Government who ought to have been given such large discretion as the bill gives to the Postmaster-General in empowering him to decide for himself as to the routes to which he will give these contracts, giving him the power to make contracts from five to fifteen years in duration. It is no reflection upon any Postmaster-General, either present or past, to say that no such power ought to be given either to him or to any other man who ever lived in this country or ever will live.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not take such an extreme view of the magnitude of the power intrusted to the Postmaster-General as the Senator from Georgia has expressed. I know it is an important power, but it seems to me there are certain limitations that any Postmaster-General would be bound to respect. Public sentiment has called for the establishment of certain routes, and public sentiment is generally a safe control in such matters.

Mr. HANNA. May I offer a suggestion?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. It must be remembered that, looking to the increase of our merchant marine, there is a third party who has to be taken into consideration in the establishment of these routes, and that is the party who proposes to build the steamers and operate them. The subsidy paid by the Government will not alone be an inducement for capital to be invested in these postal contracts. and that party must have some discretion as to whether he will operate a postal line from one place to another. The Postmaster-General, being a party to negotiate the contract, must find parties willing to make and carry out such contracts, and there must be some discretion left to the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BACON. If the senior Senator from Ohio will not consider it an intrusion, I desire to make a suggestion in response to the suggestion of the junior Senator from Ohio, and that is that that emphasizes, to my mind, this grave defect in the pending bill. It is important, if this scheme is to be carried out, that there should be lines not simply upon the most profitable routes, but that there should be lines upon routes to be developed and heretofore not developed, possibly from the fact that they are not the most profitable. Therefore it seems to me important that the routes should be specified and that it be not left entirely within the control of the Postmaster-General and a third party designated by the Senator from Ohio to limit these routes to those which in themselves may be the most profitable.

Mr. HANNA. Let me ask the Senator if he would be willing to increase the subsidy to an amount which would cover the absolute cost of operating a line, irrespective of the interest of the third party?

Mr. BACON. The Senator asks me if I would be willing to increase the subsidy. I speak with the permission of the senior Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. He must not understand me as approving of the giving of any subsidy whatever, but I do say that if the bill is to be passed, it ought to be made as proper for the purpose designed as possible, and it ought not to be left simply to the question of what may be most desirable to the parties who may enter into the contracts.

Mr. HANNA. Those of us who are interested in the passage of the bill want to make it effective at the same time.

Mr. BACON. I do not recollect to which particular provisions of the report the senior Senator from Ohio referred, but if those provisions would make the bill more perfect, it seems to me the friends of the bill ought to incorporate them in the bill. It is not for those who are opposed to it.

Mr. FORAKER. What I referred to as to specified routes is what is said in the report as to that. It is in contemplation to establish a route from San Francisco by way of Honolulu to Japan and China and, I believe, on to the Philippines, and then to establish another route from Puget Sound to Japan and China direct.

Mr. BACON. What page?

Mr. FORAKER. Pages 10 and 11, commencing at the bottom of page 10. And still another route, an alternating route, I believe, from San Francisco by way of Pango-Pango to Australia. Those are all, it seems to me, desirable routes. Whether or not the Postmaster-General will be able to get somebody to contract with him under the subsidy provided for the carrying of the mails over those routes I do not know. That remains to be seen. I can understand and I appreciate fully the force of all the Senator says, but at the same time I understand and appreciate what must have been in the mind of the committee when they said that was a matter of detail which they must leave to the Postmaster-General.

Now, there is only one other thought I wish to add, and I intend with that to conclude. I have called attention to the change in the manner of paying the subsidy. We are to pay the subsidy, under this bill, by the gross ton instead of by the mile, as under existing law, and that, I said, has among other purposes that of increasing tonnage.

They are to pay more subsidy under this bill than they do under existing law, and the reason of that is that our experience has demonstrated that the subsidy provided by the existing postal subsidy law of 1891 is insufficient for the purposes to be subserved. What has been our experience? That is the best test as to whether or not the subsidy is sufficient. We have established a trans-Atlantic line.

We entered into a contract with the Pacific Mail Company for a trans-Pacific line. After the contract had been performed for a year and a part of another year it was abandoned simply because there was so much loss attending it, they having all the subsidy the law would allow, that they could not afford to go along any further with it. and under the provision of the contract made to meet such an emergency the contract was canceled.

We have had precisely the same experience as to a contract made with the New York and Brazil Line of ships establishing a route to South America. After, I think, only three trips the company that took the contract, under the provision allowing it, abandoned it, simply because they could not successfully compete with the ships subsidized for the carrying of its mails by Great Britain.

So, as the result of the law of 1891, in existence now for more than ten years, we have this one trans-Atlantic line, the International Navigation Company, with four ships—a weekly service. I do not know what the fact is; I do not know that anybody here knows, but I have been told that that company has made no money whatever, and does not want a renewal of the contract on the terms upon which it holds the present contract. I do not know what the fact is, but it is said that it has been a loss continuously, and there is, therefore, a necessity, if we are to continue that line, and certainly a commanding necessity if we are to establish any new mail routes across the Pacific and to South America, where we most need them, that the subsidy shall be increased, and therefore it is that the subsidy provided here is an increase of the subsidy authorized by the law of 1891.

Mr. President, in all this matter there is no mystery whatever. When heretofore we have been legislating in pursuance of our protective tariff policy we have frankly and openly discussed the rates which in our judgment it was necessary to impose on goods imported coming into competition with home products, and the rates imposed have always been governed by the disadvantage which we were seeking to overcome. Just so it is here. We want to rehabilitate this industry. We want to have again a merchant marine of which every American will be proud. We can not have it to-day because American labor will not accept, and nobody ought to want American labor to accept, the wages that would enable us to successfully compete. We have established in this country the highest standard of wages known to the world, and we have done so under the policy we have been pursuing. We intend to maintain that standard. We do not want to lower it; but if we maintain that standard and at the same time have this industry, we must overcome the disadvantage to which we are subjected on account of cheaper wages elsewhere.

This is a bill the purpose of which is to overcome that disadvantage. We propose to pay out of the Treasury of the United States to these ship companies carrying our mails, and, under the general subsidy provision, to the freight-carrying vessels, a portion of our revenue, limited, reasonable in amount, not burdensome on anybody, enough, in our judgment, to overcome the disadvantage to which our ships have been subjected and to which we are subjected yet. This great, rich, powerful nation, with its 80,000,000 of people, with all its wealth and all its influence and all its power and all its glory, ought to have a merchant marine.

It has been well said in the course of this debate that it is humiliating to Americans who travel abroad, that scarcely anywhere do they find the flag of the United States in the commerce of the world. I do not wonder that these Americans feel mortified and humiliated to see only foreign flags flying everywhere. It is our duty to remedy this condition. Here is the Leyland Line, which has been purchased, 44 ships in all, and every one of them flying a foreign flag, but owned by American capital. If those other lines have been purchased there will be I do not know how many, but perhaps a hundred other vessels added, all flying a foreign flag, all documented abroad, all registered abroad, not one of them registered here, not one of them an American ship in any sense of the word, except only that our capital is invested in them.

What we want, Mr. President, is legislation that will enable us in our own shipyards, employing our own mechanics, the best, the most intelligent, the brainiest and most capable workmen in the world, to build our own ships, and with American bottoms, laden with American products, manned by American seamen, sail the seas and go into every port of the world.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I approach this argument with a great deal of diffidence, because I feel that the discussion of the bill is practically exhausted. I do not undertake to discuss it with the belief that I can add any thought to the controversy which has not already been presented to the Senate, but because I have some ideas in reference to the measure now pending which I wish to place before the Senate, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short while in doing so.

I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to the principle contained in the bill. The measure may be considered in various points as involving moral, legal, political, and business questions. The moral question involved is whether it is right for the Congress of the United States, because it has the power to do so, to take from one man his property—whether it be money, goods, or land—and give it to another. The legal question involved is whether the Constitution of the United States gives Congress the power to do that. The political question involved is whether it is expedient to do so if the Constitution has delegated that power to the Congress of the United States. The business proposition involved is whether it is profitable as an investment.

. There may be and there is difference of opinion among lawyers as to whether there is any constitutional power in Congress to grant this subsidy; but whether or not there is any power in the Constitution, under which the Government is organized, to take from one man his money, his goods, or his land and give it to another, there is one proposition about which there ought not to be any controversy in the minds of men. There is an inhibition in the constitution of morals and of right against the taking of a man's property, whether it is money, or goods, or land, and giving it to another.

Mr. President, I propose to submit a few suggestions in reference to the legal question involved in this measure—the question whether the Constitution gives power to the Congress of the United States to do this—before taking up the practical question and examining the bill in its details.

Just here I wish to say that the Constitution, in its original conception and in its amendments, has provided that the power that Congress has is a delegated power, and that there is no power in Congress to enact any law except that which is delegated to it by the Constitution. In other words, the Congress of the United States must look to the Constitution for the power that it exercises in the framing of any law to see whether that power is granted or not, whereas the legislatures of the different States may enact any law that is not prohibited by the constitution of the State.

There is a provision in the Constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation to the owner of it. Surely it must have been contemplated that no Congress would take the private property of one man and give it to a private individual, if it was thought proper to embody in the Constitution an inhibition against the taking of the private property of an individual for public use without giving him compensation for it, I do not care whether that private property is money that is taxed out of the individual or whether it is his property in goods or land or anything else that he may own.

But I go further, and I will cite the Senate to a provision in the Constitution which seems to me to be clearly prohibitory of the enactment of this bill. Granting that it is within the power of the Congress given by the Constitution under which the Government is framed to grant subsidies, yet I do not believe, even if that power exists, that it is within the power of Congress to enact this bill, which does more than grant a subsidy. It undertakes to discriminate between the ports of different States.

I know that the Constitution has been sneered at by the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]. I know that men who measure their judgment and their votes upon questions under discussion in the Senate of the United States by that instrument which they are supposed to observe, and which they are sworn to observe, are twitted for being overconscientious. That instrument under which each Senator in this body holds his seat, under which each Senator in this body draws his compensation for the services he renders to his country, under which the armies of the United States are levied and the Navy of the United States provided and maintained, is sneered at if Senators dare to say that before they will vote for any measure that comes before the Senate of the United States they will investigate and see whether it contravenes that instrument or not. Still that ought not to prohibit our going into a discussion as to whether a measure is constitutional or not.

Now, I want to read to the Senate a provision of the Constitution of the United States, and then read the title of this bill:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound, etc.

This is paragraph 6 of section 9 of the first article of the Constitution.

I grant that Congress has the power, if it sees proper to do so, to establish postal routes. It has the power to establish postal routes between any two different stations that it sees proper to do so. It has the power to establish a postal route between New York and Liverpool, New York and Southampton, New York and Constantinople, or any other place. However, this bill is not for the purpose of establishing postal routes, but it is actually for the purpose of subsidizing ships, as it is said, to promote commerce. Let us see what the bill says in its title:

To provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Now, I want to see the construction of that by one of those who has debated this bill in favor of it. Mark you, the title of the bill is not confined to providing an ocean mail service, nor to providing for the common defense, but to promote commerce. It has been the argument of every Senator who has supported this measure that it is intended to benefit the commerce of the United States. No one has contended that the object of the bill is alone the establishment of the mail service, and no one has contended that that is the main purpose of the bill; but the purpose is to give a subsidy, and a subsidy that benefits one port and discriminates against another port in another State in the Union.

The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who debated this bill yesterday, who is, I understand, a shipowner and understands something about commerce, says that—

Were it simply to facilitate the carrying of mails in American vessels, I should likewise oppose it.

That being so, it being for the purpose of commerce, the power is placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General. His power is unlimited in this respect. There is not a line in the bill that limits the Postmaster-General. He may establish a mail service under the bill between New York and Liverpool or between New Orleans and Liverpool or between Philadelphia and Liverpool and anywhere else. He is not required to establish a mail service from any other port of the United States. If the bill itself had provided for subsidizing ships to run between New York and a port in any foreign country or between Philadelphia or Baltimore or any other seaport, and had left out the seaports of any State in the Union, it would have been discriminating against ports of the States thus left out. If the Congress of the United States could not select certain ports, but must select the ports in all the States and give them all the benefit of a bounty, because this is nothing more than a bounty, surely it has no right to delegate that power. It can not delegate to the Postmaster-General a power that it does not have itself.

I contend that the bill, therefore, contravenes that provision of the Constitution which I have heard read, namely, paragraph 6 of section 9 of Article I of the Constitution. But I am not alone in that. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], in his introductory speech on the bill, in opening this debate, used the following language:

Some have suggested bounties, but they are clearly repugnant to the Constitution and in violation of 24 treaties.

It is not claimed that they are against the Constitution because they are in violation of the treaties, but it is claimed that the bounties are against the Constitution and in violation of the treaties. What is a bounty but a subsidy? What is a subsidy but a bounty? Either one as defined is something given by the Government to encourage an industry. If it is unconstitutional to give a bounty directly, as is contended by the Senator from Maine, who is in charge of the bill and who is chairman of the committee, then it surely is unconstitutional to undertake to do so indirectly.

I leave that branch of the subject, though, with the suggestions which I have made, and I come now to discuss the expediency of this measure—whether it ought to be enacted or not. It is contended by Senators, as said by the Senator from Maine in his opening speech, that last year was the year in which came the final climax of the decadence of our merchant marine; and in order to establish that the fact is referred to that but a small per cent of the immense amount of American commerce was carried in vessels floating the American flag.

Mr. President, there is one authority to which reference has been made by those who have favored the bill in this discussion as being not only unquestioned but unquestionable, and that is the report of the Commissioner of Navigation. I find on the ninth page of that report, following the table of contents, but on the first page really of the report, language which may give some reason for the decadence of our ships on the high seas; that is, it may give some reason why such a large amount of the commerce of the United States is carried abroad in foreign ships, or in ships floating foreign flags instead of ships floating American flags. He says:

Our shipping is now virtually absorbed in our systems of internal and domestic communication.

But let us see whether it is the fact that the last year has shown a decadence of American shipping. A few days ago there was put into the RECORD a prospectus of the United States Shipbuilding Company. In that prospectus we find a proposition to organize into a syndicate, or into a trust, 7 of the 46 establishments for building ships in this country. It is proposed that a little less than one-sixth and a little more than one-seventh of the shipbuilding establishments of this country shall be combined into a shipbuilding trust, and in that trust is to be taken, I suppose, three of the great railways of this country. At least, the presidents of two of them and the vice-president of one are men who have signed this prospectus. In that the aggregate of orders now in hand is stated of the constituent companies; that is, of the 7 companies of the 46, because 46 is the number given by the Commissioner of Navigation as being the number of establishments in this country building ships. Of these, 7 have combined, as I stated before, and the aggregate orders now in hand of the constituent companies exceeds $63,000,000, covering an average of eighteen months for completion, on which the estimated profit is over $7,000,000.

Now, then, is it necessary in order to encourage our shipbuilding that we should give a bonus to those who are engaged in shipping when 7 out of the 46 shipbuilding establishments in this country have $63,000,000 of orders on hand for the building of ships to be completed within eighteen months and out of which they expect to get profits of over $7,000,000? Whatever is given by the bill is a pure and simple subsidy and nothing else. It is so stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]; it is so stated by both the Senators from Ohio; it is so stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and everyone who has discussed the bill has stated that it is a subsidy. If we give this subsidy to those who are engaged in shipbuilding, is it not a contribution by the Government to the dividends of those who are engaged in shipping instead of being for the purpose of encouraging shipbuilding in this country?

But that is not all. It is said that the estimated net earnings for 1901 for this syndicate that is formed, this trust, this combination, was $4,223,000; the estimated net earnings for 1902, $5,612,500; the estimated net earnings for 1903, $7,500,000, making a total of $17,335,500 of estimated net earnings for three years of 7 out of the 46 shipbuilding establishments in the United States. When there are orders to the extent of $63,000,000 in less than one-sixth of the shipbuilding establishments in the United States, is it a fact that we are in the decadence of shipbuilding?

But that is not all. We have the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, who says:

While our tonnage, with the increase of the past three months, is greater than at the outbreak of the civil war, the nature of its operations is radically changed.

Again, on page 12 of the report, he says:

While the increase in registered steam tonnage, 88,380, is the largest in our history—

That is the increase in the registered tonnage for the year ending the 30th of June, 1901. If this be a fact, as was stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] who has just addressed the Senate and as is the belief of everyone because it is officially brought to us, can it be true that we are in the climax of the decadence of our shipbuilding industry?

Right here I want to call attention to one fact. When Senators decry the information that is derived from sources nonofficial, they are decrying the sources of the information of the Commissioner of Navigation himself, because he states that he gets his returns from the replies of those who are engaged in the shipbuilding industry. On page 21 the Commissioner of Navigation, who seems to have made this report with a view to presenting an argument to the people of the United States and to the Congress in favor of granting the subsidy, says:

The returns of capital invested are very incomplete, but on the basis of reports made this year and last year the capital actually invested undoubtedly exceeds $68,000,000. The number of men directly employed is approximately 46,000. The value of the merchant vessels covered in the tabulation is approximately $36,000,000, and the naval contracts call for an expenditure of $78,000,000.

Further on he says:

The table shows 89 steel merchant vessels, of 355,645 gross tons, under construction or contract at the beginning of the current fiscal year. At the beginning of the past fiscal year a similar return showed 68 steel steam vessels, of 277,689 tons, under construction.

Showing that at the beginning of the current fiscal year there were nearly 100,000 tons more of steel vessels under construction than there were at the beginning of the last fiscal year, denying the proposition that we have reached the climax of decadence.

There is no decadence in our shipbuilding. On the contrary, reports from the shipbuilders themselves, and the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, and every source of information to which we have any avenue show that the shipbuilding industry is now on a boom such as it has not had in the last fifty years. It does seem that this bill might have been framed with a view to getting in ahead of the procession and getting the flag and bearing it, and after the bill is passed, and after the results are obtained which are being obtained every year, claim the credit through this bill for the improvement going on.

"The last three years," says the Commissioner of Navigation, "have been prosperous years in shipbuilding." "The last fiscal year," says the Commissioner of Navigation, "was the most profitable of those three." "The present fiscal year," says the Commissioner of Navigation, "is more prosperous in its outlook, in its prospect, than last year, so that it will be more prosperous in shipbuilding than any of the four years past, including the current fiscal year."

The information that is before the Senate and that can not be doubted is a fact just as indisputable, just as well established, as any fact that has been put before the Senate. The information is that the shipbuilding establishments are now crowded with work, that they have work ahead for several years, and that there is a rise in the shipbuilding industry such as has not been here for many years before.

I give the statement from the prospectus of the shipbuilding companies that have combined and have formed a trust, and one of the purposes of that trust I want to show. I give the statement also of the Commissioner of Navigation, who has access probably to more sources of information than any member of the Senate and probably more sources of information than anybody except those who are engaged in shipbuilding themselves. These statements establish the fact that we are building more ships now in our shipbuilding establishments than we have built at any time in many years previous.

Why is there this combination of these shipbuilding establishments? Here they are given:

The acquirement by this corporation of all the plants and properties above stated presents distinct advantages, as stated by Naval Constructor F. T. Bowles (now rear-admiral and chief constructor of the United States Navy) in his report dated December 22, 1900, as follows—

The acquirement of these seven plants by this company presents these distinct advantages:

1. Each concern builds that for which it is best fitted and equipped or that which its character, location, and labor can accomplish most economically.

The argument has been made here that this is for the purpose of benefiting labor. I have always had this objection to this mode of benefiting labor. The proposition to benefit labor is to give the money outright to the capitalist and to require the laborer to toil for it. That has been the policy of protection under the system of the Republican party. That is the kind of protection against which I enter my protest and to which I object.

This combination is not for the purpose of elevating labor; not for the purpose of giving employment to labor at higher and better wages; not for the purpose of increasing the wages of the laborer, but for the purpose of getting the work done by the laborer as economically as possible. That is the proposition. By this combine labor seeks employment at the hands of one corporation, instead of at the hands of seven corporations. When two employers are running after one laborer, the price of laber is high; but when two laborers are running after one employer for the same job, labor is cheap. So if there are seven of these establishments seeking to employ the same laborer to do the same work, the wages of labor necessarily go up; but if they combine in one institution or shipbuilding company, and there is only one employer seeking for labor and two laborers seeking for employment, the price of labor would go down, as one of the results of the protective policy of which we have heard so much in this discussion.

While it is on my mind and lest I forget it, I wish to call attention to another matter. The question was asked a while ago by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] what would have been the result if we had not given protection to the steel industry in this country, and then he answered that we would have built railroads just the same, but all the steel rails would have come from England. No; this would have been the result if there had been no prohibitive tariff put upon steel and iron: We should have had just as much steel and iron manufactured in this country as we have to-day. All reason goes to prove it, because the steel manufacturers of this country are not only able to compete here with the manufacturers of steel and iron in England, but with the makers of steel rails in England, to compete at the Englishman's home.

If that be true, there is no necessity in the world for a protective policy which would protect the steel manufacturer except to allow him to monoplize the entire American market and to charge the American consumer of steel higher rates than he charges the English consumer of steel, so that he can make the American consumer of steel rails pay a part of the price of steel rails which are purchased and consumed by the foreigner. The result would not have been that we should have been building railroads in this country out of steel rails purchased from England, but we should have been building railroads in this country out of steel rails that we purchased at home, domestic steel rails, at a cheaper price than is now charged. One of the results would have been the prevention of the immense steel combine or trust that has absolute control and monopoly of the steel business in this country. We should have been building railroads at a cheaper rate than they have been built, we should have given employment to more people in the United States, and we should have built more railroads. The country would have been threaded with railroads, and more labor would have been employed in building them.

But, another thing:

2. Structural materials, steel, iron, timber, etc., can be purchased at the lowest rates, a prompt supply secured at points where it is most needed.
3. The technical knowledge of design, which comes from experience, records, and data of each concern, will be combined, thus giving confidence to customers that the results contracted for shall be attained.
4. The healthy professional rivalry of the various yards can be utilized to produce the best results in design, construction, and administration—without the disastrous and narrowing devices of destructive competition.

There has not been a debate on the tariff question which I have heard in the Senate, or which I have read since the tariff has been before the American people, in which it has not been urged that we must give protection to these infant industries so as to build them up, and after they are built up the competition will reduce the price, so that the people of the United States will get the benefit of competition in manufactured articles in all these interests that are protected.

I say that there has been no debate where any other position was taken until the day before yesterday in this body, when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] said that he did not confine his doctrine of protection to the protection of infant industries, but that he stood upon a broader plane and was in favor of protecting not only infant industries, but after they had grown to manhood—I am not giving his language, but I quote the substance of what he said—he was in favor of continuing the protective policy as to them, and yet before he had gone but a little distance in his argument of the question he said after this policy of subsidizing ships—he denominated it "protection"—had gone so far as to build up the merchant marine and give us a merchant marine which would enable us to compete with the other countries of the world we could take it off, and that he was in favor of taking off this subsidy. That is the first time I have heard that stated in any discussion or debate on the part of those who are in favor of the protective policy. They have always stated that their idea was to build up these infant industries, and after a large number had been established, had gotten on their feet and were able to take care of themselves, we were then to get the advantage of the competition which they would give to the people.

This company is to be composed of seven shipbuilding establishments in the United States, and it is said:

It can be administered without the disastrous and narrowing devices of destructive competition.

Another reason is:

5. The standardization of the numberless details of ship fittings, auxiliaries, and appliances, which are now almost as various and incongruous in design as they are in number, and their production in quantity by those best qualified, would produce enormous economies.

I have read from this and I have read from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation to show that we are not in any decadence. I might read from a great number of statements, to which I have the references, but I shall not detain the Senate for that purpose. I want to take up the bill and discuss it for a few moments, and then I shall have done.

This bill, as I stated, fixes no limit to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. It provides that—

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to enter into contracts—

That is as far as he is directed in this bill, except as to the amount that he shall not exceed in these subsidies—for a term not less than five nor more than fifteen years in duration.

I desire to ask this question of Senators who support this bill: What is the necessity for putting in here a contract for fifteen years? Would not a contract for five years be sufficient? It has been said that this bill can be repealed; but no contract that is made under the bill can be repealed. If a law authorizes the Government to make a contract, then, even if the Congress of the United States had the authority to repeal it, good faith would require that whenever a contract had been made the party with whom the Government contracted should keep faith, and that the Government of the United States should keep faith and carry out its part of the contract. That being so, if we contract for fifteen years for the carrying of the mails——

Mr. MALLORY. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Right at that point I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this bill contemplates encouraging shipbuilding, and vessels can not be constructed suitable for transporting the mail inside of two or three years. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the Postmaster-General from making a contract in futuro, to take effect beginning three or four years hence, after the ships shall have been built on certain lines, which would run it considerably over fifteen years from this date.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly. I thank the Senator from Florida for the suggestion. This bill provides for a contract—for a term not less than five nor more than fifteen years in duration, with American citizens for the carrying of mails on American steamships between ports of the United States and such ports in foreign countries, the Dominion of Canada excepted, as in his judgment, having regard to the national defense, will best subserve and promote the postal, commercial, and maritime interests of the United States.

Under this bill the Postmaster-General may make a contract with an American citizen; and I do not think it is straining the construction of this bill to say that an American citizen may be a corporation, because the bill expressly includes corporations by saying:

Including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof.

A corporation being an artificial person, its stockholders may be foreigners or Americans or mixed. I say if the contract commences five years after this and runs for fifteen years that would make it twenty years, and if it commences ten years after this that would make it run for twenty-five years. The Postmaster-General may make a contract with any ship he sees proper to engage, and he may make it at the highest rate mentioned in this bill.

It was said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that no Postmaster-General would think of making a contract for carrying the mails from this country to Southampton in any ship with a speed of less than 20 knots an hour; and he admitted the fact, as stated in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, that there are but 4 ships of 20 knots an hour, and they all belong to the same line. So that if a contract be made for carrying the mails between this country and Southampton, the Senator from Maine being the judge, it is bound to be made with the line owning these 4 ships, and without any competition at all.

Not only that, but the Secretary of the Navy must have an officer to examine each ship and pass upon its fitness for the purpose for which it is intended, and give his approval to those ships before they can compete at all. Then they may compete, not by advertising for bids, as stated by Senators here, because there is nothing in the bill that requires advertisement, but bids may be received privately, so that the contract is let to the lowest responsible bidder, according to the estimate placed upon the responsible bidder by the Postmaster-General.

I say that it is put into the power of the Postmaster-General to make these contracts without limit. They may be made to Southampton, or to Constantinople, or to Hongkong, or to Nagasaki, or to any other place the Postmaster-General sees proper, and he may give them to any port which he desires, the only requirement being what may be his judgment as to what is an equitable distribution among the Atlantic, the Mexican, the Gulf, and the Pacific ports. He may make contracts that will run, I say, for twenty or twenty-five years from this time, only limiting them to the proposition that the contracts can exist for but fifteen years from the time they commence.

Within that time many ships may be built, shipping may be a great deal cheaper than it is now, and it may not be necessary to give any subsidy, even according to the judgment of the Senators who have framed this bill, in order to enable our merchant marine to compete with the merchant marine of foreign nations, yet we are bound down by contract, made under a law of Congress, that is binding morally, legally, and constitutionally upon the Government of the United States, to continue this subsidy, because, at last, as stated by Senators who have discussed this bill, and especially by the Senator from North Dakota, who said it was a subsidy pure and simple, we shall be giving a subsidy when the necessity for it shall have long since ceased. Not only that, but it may be unlimited in amount. You take a 20-knot ship of 10,000 tons and let that carry the mail to Constantinople, which I believe is about 5,000 miles, and on its voyage going and returning that ship will be entitled to $27,000. That $27,000 may be repeated sixteen times a year. When we examine the matter carefully we find that for the sixteen trips it will amount to $432,000 for one ship.

If you make the subsidy contract with a ship for carrying the mail to Southampton from New York, then that ship will be entitled to subsidy in the proportion to $27,000 that 3,100 miles is to 5,000 miles, which would make it a little more than $12,000, probably $15,000 or $16,000.

There is no limit to the authority of the Postmaster-General to make these contracts. He may make just as many of them as he sees proper to make, and bind the Government of the United States to pay these subsidies for thirty years from now, because he can make the term commence fifteen years from now.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It is no interruption at all.

Mr. ALLISON. But I should like to have his construction again of the provisions of this statute. I understood the Senator to state that the Postmaster-General would not be required to advertise.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. That, I think, depends upon how much of the act of 1891 remains in force. It took me some time to ascertain whether or not the sections of the act of 1891 which are not proposed to be amended by this bill are still in force, but I think they are, and if so, I think the Postmaster-General will be required under section 2 of the act of 1891 to make public advertisement.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Now, let us see what that section will be if this bill shall become a law.

Mr. ALLISON. I was misled for a time in studying this question——

Mr. MALLORY. This bill does not amend at all section 2 of the act of 1891. It leaves it in force.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not amend it at all?

Mr. MALLORY. No; it does not.

Mr. ALLISON. Then that section is still in force.

Mr. MALLORY. That section is still in force, requiring advertisement in different cities of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; and it is to be done for a period of ninety days.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I stand corrected. I had not examined that section in the law of 1891. I had only examined section 1, where it speaks of the lowest responsible bidder. Will the Senator kindly read the section of the act of 1891 to which he has referred?

Mr. ALLISON. Section 2 of the act of March 3, 1891, provides:

That before making any contract for carrying ocean mails in accordance with this act the Postmaster-General shall give public notice by advertising once a week, for three months, in such daily papers as he shall select in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, St. Louis, Charleston, Norfolk, Savannah, Galveston, and Mobile, and when the proposed service is to be on the Pacific Ocean, then in San Francisco, Tacoma, and Portland. Such notice shall describe the route, the time when such contract will be made, the duration of the same, the size of the steamers to be used, the number of trips a year, the times of sailing, and the time when the service shall commence, which shall not be more than three years after the contract shall be let.

I understand that particular provision to mean that a contract may be let three years in advance of the construction of a ship and that the person making the contract will, under that provision, have three years in which to construct the ship, but not a longer period.

The section then provides:

The details of the mode of advertising and letting such contracts shall be conducted in the manner prescribed in chapter 8 of Title XLVI of the Revised Statutes for the letting of inland mail contracts so far as the same shall be applicable to the ocean mail service.

Chapter 8 of Title XLVI of the Revised Statutes, referred to in section 2 of the act of 1891, provides for the inland service. So that if section 2 of that act be still in force—as I think it will be after this bill shall become a law—then the advertising must be made according to section 2 of the act of 1891, which will require that the service shall be commenced not later than three years after the contract shall be entered into.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I agree with the Senator. Then that will make it eighteen years from the time the contract is made.

Mr. ALLISON. It will make it eighteen years if the contract should be made now.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir, until the subsidy would cease; but suppose the contract is made five years from now, then it will be twenty-three years.

Mr. ALLISON. That is correct.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Then, Mr. President, the contract that is made to commence in future can only commence three years after the contract is made, but there is no limitation upon the time when the contract can be made? It can be made at any time so long as this law shall be in existence; and from the time that it shall be made it will be eighteen years until it shall have ceased to operate and the subsidy shall cease to be paid to the party or parties with whom the contract is made.

It is true that the Postmaster-General is required to advertise for bids, but, nevertheless, in making contracts or receiving bids for contracts for carrying the mails on ships of the capacity of 20 knots an hour there can be no competition, because there is but one line having steamers with sufficient speed to comply with the law to carry the mail, and that line has four steamers. There can be no competition with them.

Then, again, before any vessel can compete, it has to be examined by the Secretary of the Navy, or by an officer selected by him, whose report must be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, before a man can become a bidder for one of these contracts.

And upon each departure from the United States the following proportion of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: During the first two years of such contract for carrying the mails, one-fourth thereof.

The crew must be composed of one-fourth of American citizens at the time of its departure from the United States, but it is not necessary that they shall remain in the crew until the ship returns. There may be a crew selected one-third of them American citizens, and they may leave the American port and at the first port to which they come the Americans may be discharged and foreigners taken, even Chinese, at the rate of $15 a month, Mexican money, which is seven dollars and a half a month, as testified to by Captain Seabury, and they may be kept on the ship until she returns and every dollar of subsidy be collected.

I will not detain the Senate longer with that feature of the bill; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a question that was propounded the other day by the Senator from Iowa and the answer which was made to it by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and to show that the chairman, the Senator from Maine, was mistaken in his answer. This is the colloquy between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine:

Mr. ALLISON. Now, under title 2, as I understand it, all vessels now in the United States, whether steam or sail, can receive the subsidy.

Mr. FRYE. Above 1,000 tons.

Mr. ALLISON. Above 1,000 tons?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; above 1,000 tons.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like the Senator to point out that provision to me.

Mr. FRYE. It is in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I know there is a provision on page 7 which reads as follows:

"On each entry, not exceeding sixteen entries in any one fiscal year, and for a period of five years from the date of registration of a vessel of over 1,000 gross registered tons, which shall be completed and registered."

But I can find no limitation as to the value or size of either a sail vessel or a steam vessel that are now owned in the United States.

Mr. FRYE. I will find it for the Senator when I have a few moments. It is there.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is there, then the point of my question is answered.

Mr. FRYE. In 1891 we had a general bounty bill something like this, only providing for 3 cents a mile instead of 1. That passed the Senate, and under that bill all vessels above 500 tons were included. It was increased in this instance to a thousand tons, because it was not regarded as prudent to encourage the building of ships smaller than 1,000 tons under any circumstances on account of the rates of freight.

Here is the provision in the bill which the Senator from Maine overlooked:

SEC. 6. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1902, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, subject to the provisions of this title, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the owner or owners of any vessel of the United States duly registered by a citizen or citizens of the United States (including as such citizens any corporation created under the laws of the United States or any of the States thereof), and being at the time of entry engaged in the foreign trade of the United States, which shall be entered in the United States from a foreign port or from any port in the Philippine Islands, compensation as hereinafter provided, that is to say:

(a) On each entry, not exceeding sixteen entries in any one fiscal year, of a sail or steam vessel, 1 cent per gross registered ton for each 100 nautical miles sailed.

If Senators will examine that, they will see that there is no limitation to a vessel of more than a thousand tons, but if the vessel is of any tonnage and is in the foreign trade it is entitled to this bounty of 1 cent per ton for every 100 nautical miles. But the section to which the Senator from Iowa alluded is a section limiting the additional bounty to vessels of more than a thousand tons. Every vessel, it does not make any difference whether it is a vessel of a thousand tons or less than a thousand tons or more than a thousand tons, is entitled to the 1-cent bounty; but in addition to that, vessels of more than a thousand tons are entitled to this bounty. I read paragraph b:

(b) On each entry, not exceeding 16 entries in any one fiscal year, and for a period of five years from the date of registration of a vessel of over 1,000 gross registered tons, which shall be completed and registered after the passage of this act, one-fourth of 1 cent per gross registered ton for each 100 nautical miles sailed, in addition to the compensation provided in paragraph (a).

Now, the 1-cent bounty is given to every vessel whether of a thousand tons or less or more, but every vessel of over a thousand tons is given a quarter-cent additional bounty.

Section 7 provides:

SEC. 7. That compensation under this title shall not be allowed in respect of any of the following-named vessels:

(a) A vessel on a voyage extending only to a foreign port less than 150 nautical miles from her last port of departure in the United States or from a foreign port less than 150 nautical miles from her first port of arrival in the United States.

(b) A vessel on a voyage less than one-half of the whole length of which, on her outward and homeward voyages, respectively, shall have been on the sea between a port of the United States and a foreign port.

(c) A vessel which shall not be at least of the Class A1, as classified either by the Record of American and Foreign Shipping or the United States Standard Owners, Builders, and Underwriters' Association, or equivalent classification in any other register of shipping of at least equal merit.

(d) A vessel of which less than one-fourth of the crew shall be citizens of the United States or such persons as shall be within the provisions of section 2174 of the Revised Statutes.

(e) A vessel without motive power of its own, or a tugboat, or a vessel engaged in wrecking.

(f) A foreign-built vessel, hereafter admitted to American registry pursuant to the provisions of section 4136 of the Revised Statutes.

(g) A vessel while employed in the coasting trade.

Those are the vessels which are not admitted to this bounty, and I read them all to show that there is nothing here that precludes a vessel of less than a thousand tons from the bounty of 1 cent.

Right here, to show that that is the correct construction, in the speech of the Senator from Maine on the 3d of March he said what I am about to read. The bill had been amended.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 8, line 8, in subdivision (e), after the article "A," to strike out "barge, canal boat, or;" so as to make the clause read:

"(e) A vessel without motive power of its own, or a tugboat, or a vessel engaged in wrecking."

Mr. FRYE. I am not exactly satisfied with that amendment proposed in subdivision (e): "A barge, canal boat, or vessel without motive power of its own." There are some few barges which have small masts and small sails sufficient to keep their heads to the wind to provide for safety in case the tug breaks loose from them that might be counted to a certain extent "motive power of its own." I do not think there was any intention on the part of anybody to allow such barges to come in under this subsidy provision, and therefore I move to strike out subdivision (e), as it stands in the bill, and to insert as a substitute for it what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out subdivision (e) and in lieu thereof to insert:

"(e) A barge, canal boat, or vessel proceeding from port to port in tow, or a tugboat or a vessel engaged in wrecking."

Before I pass from section 6 of the bill I wish to call attention to what may be done under the provisions of the bill as far as it has been amended. Those citizens of the United States are embraced within the bill who are corporations created under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof. So the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin as to what was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States can have no reference to this matter, for the reason that the statute can change the law and the Supreme Court only decides what the law is at the time the decision is made. The statute can change the law, and it is provided in this bill itself that these corporations can receive the bounty. So if there is a corporation in the United States engaged in shipping, which is chartered under the laws of the United States or the law of any State, and if that corporation is composed entirely of citizens of a foreign country, then the citizens of the foreign country would, as stockholders in the corporation, be entitled to the bounty that would be paid under this proposed law.

Now, it was said in the argument for the bill that there are millions of dollars paid by the American people to foreigners for the conveyance of their commerce to and from foreign countries which ought to be retained in the pockets of the people of the United States. It was not remembered at the time that a great many of these foreign ships are owned in America, and in the case mentioned the other day I believe it was stated that 800,000 tons of foreign shipping had been bought by an American syndicate, not registered in the United States, not sailing under the United States flag, but sailing under the flag of foreign countries, documented in foreign countries. But the money they received belonged to the people of the United States—that is, the owners of the vessels, who are citizens of the United States—just as much as if the vessels were sailing under the American flag and the per cent was added to the per cent of the commerce of the United States that is carried under the American flag.

Here, under the provisions of this bill, a foreign corporation, nominally an American citizen, because a corporation is an ideal existence, an artificial person under the law, owned possibly entirely in its stock by foreigners, nevertheless is an American citizen, and it is included by express terms in the provisions of this bill. I refer to section 6 of the bill. Each one of them would be entitled to this subsidy, and that is one of the reasons why I desire to see the bill amended so as to require that the names of all these firms with whom the Postmaster-General shall contract shall be given, and the names of the incorporators and of the stockholders in the corporations who receive the bounty shall be registered and a record kept, so that the people who pay the money may have an opportunity to examine the record and know to whom they pay it and who are the recipients of the bounties that have been granted out of their pockets to the shipping interests of the country.

This is called "compensation" in the bill. Compensation for what? Compensation presupposes that there shall be a quid pro quo; that there shall be something given for the compensation. "Compensation" is put in the bill, for what reason I do not know; for euphony, I suppose. It may have a better sound than "subsidy" or "bounty." Nevertheless, in the discussion of this bill by nearly all the Senators who have spoken in its advocacy it has been called a subsidy. One Senator said it was a subsidy pure and simple—a subsidy for the purpose of cheapening freight rates and benefiting the wheat producers. If freight rates are cheapened, it will benefit the cotton growers in the section to which I belong as much as the wheat growers, for nearly all the cotton goes abroad. But it makes no difference to the producers of cotton and of wheat whether their produce goes in foreign bottoms or in American bottoms. The only point with them is whether freight is cheaper or higher; and at the very time when it is said that we are building up our merchant marine, because it is intended by the Congress of the United States to give a bounty to those who are engaged in the shipping industry, there is a combination and a trust in the shipbuilding of the United States.

I believe I have said all I desire to say in reference to these features of the bill. I wish to say just a little in reference to the amendment, and possibly something may come across my mind while I am doing that to which I may incidentally allude. I offered the other day an amendment to the bill, embracing four sections. I suppose there can be no objection to the amendment. I can not see how any Senator can vote against the amendment.

It provides in the first place for ascertaining to whom the subsidies are paid, the names of the firms and of the members of the firms; those who are interested in the contract; if they are corporations, the names of the incorporators and the names of the stockholders, so that the people who pay the bounties or subsidies may know to whom they are paid, whether the stockholder in a corporation is an American citizen or whether he is not an American citizen; if he is not an American citizen, then of what country he is a citizen or of what foreign potentate he is a subject. There can be no objection to that.

It can not affect the principles that are involved in this bill. If the purpose is to build up the shipping interests of our country, and if the American people are to be taxed for that purpose, how can it be objected to by those who are levying the tax upon them and requiring them to pay the tax, that they shall have an opportunity to know where the money goes? It seems to me no reasonable man, Senator or Representative, could object to that.

But there is another provision to which I think no man can object, and that is that no Senator or Representative in Congress, no President of the United States, no judge of any court of the United States, shall be interested in any way in these contracts or in the receipt of money under these contracts. Can there be any objection to that? Is it possible that a Senator of the United States or a member of the House would want to vote a subsidy to himself or that a President would want to sign a bill giving a subsidy to himself? Then there is the strongest reason why the members of the Congress of the United States, both in the Senate and House of Representatives, should not want to participate in the bounties that are to be given under this bill.

Not only so, but there ought to be the strongest reason why everyone should want to say that he is disinterested in it. I do not suppose there is any Senator who has any interest in it. I certainly know of none, nor do I know of any Representative or President who has any interest in it. Yet there can be no objection to putting a provision of that kind in the bill, so that a Senator will not be voting a subsidy to himself, nor will any Representative be voting a subsidy to himself or be voting for a bill to give him a subsidy. Every legislator, it does not make any difference in what body he votes, ought to be entirely disinterested in every vote he gives. How can he be disinterested when he is voting on a matter in which his financial interests are involved?

Now, the framers of the Constitution, in section 6 of Article I of the Constitution, paragraph 2, provided:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

The framers of the Constitution did not think it reflected upon members of the Senate or members of the House of Representatives to put a provision in the Constitution that "no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall be increased during such time," removing all temptation to any Senator or Representative to vote for the increase of the salary of any office in which he might be placed. Recognizing the fallibility of human judgment, recognizing, as was said by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] in his very able and learned discussion of this question yesterday, the fact that a man would provide for himself and for his own household, the Constitution of the United States intended to put the temptation out of his reach and to provide that he must decide a question disinterestedly.

Suppose a sheriff is selling property at auction under a fieri facias, he can not bid at his own sale. Why? Because his duty is to make the property bring as much as possible. His interest is to make it bring as little as possible, and where his duty and his interest conflict, the law has provided that his interest shall be eliminated; and he is not allowed to bid at all.

The same with a tax collector when he is selling property, personal or real, to raise the taxes of a defaulting taxpayer. He is not allowed to bid at his own sale for the reason I have indicated with reference to the bidding of the sheriff. His interest and his duty conflict, and the law eliminates his interest in order that he may more impartially perform the duty which the law devolves upon him. So it was in the case of the framers of the Constitution. They provided in this document that a Senator or a Representative shall not have a conflict of his interest and his duty. His duty is to decide it impartially.

Now, to illustrate that, I read in this morning's paper, the Washington Post, the following article:

Mr. Theall, local counsel for Mr. Mealy, the American citizen who is held under an order of court in Mexico for contempt, has submitted to the State Department, through United States Senator NELSON, a long statement of the case from Mealy's side, which reflects upon United States Ambassador Powell Clayton.

It is alleged that the ambassador has misrepresented the facts in the case to the Department, and that he is interested in a rival mining company, which has affected his attitude toward Mealy and his legal fight with the development company, which forms the basis of the present action against him.

I wish to remark right here that I do not know anything about the merits of this matter. I do not read the article for the purpose of reflecting upon the American minister to Mexico. His side is not heard in this statement. It is only the statement of one side, and there may be nothing in it at all, and I do not condemn him unheard. He may be perfectly innocent of it. I hope he is. I give him the benefit of the doubt in my opinion and hold him to be innocent until there is some evidence convicting him. But what I want to show is the opinion of a very learned and very able Senator in this Chamber as to the necessity for impartiality in all the duties that pertain to any office under the Government of the United States; that is, the necessity of eliminating one's interest when it conflicts with his duty as an official of the United States. I read further:

In sending the papers to the State Department Senator NELSON wrote quite a lengthy letter and refers to the accompanying papers, among which is an affidavit in Spanish by Juan Barrera, with an English translation showing the alleged connection of Ambassador Clayton with certain mining companies in Mexico, in which Mexican Government officials also are interested. Senator NELSON refers to what he calls the serious import of the charges, and suggests the impropriety of a minister from this country being a member of a large mining company which is looking for favors from the Mexican Government.

He says such a minister will not be in a condition to protect an American citizen against the encroachments of a company in which many of the leading officials of the Mexican Government are interested. He says there is a rule as to consuls which does not allow them to engage in trade in countries to which they are sent, and states that the necessity for such a rule should be much stronger in preventing a diplomatic officer from engaging in speculative mining enterprises. The Senator suggests that the questions involved in the Mealy case are important, especially as they affect the status of the ambassador to Mexico.

Now, then, it is held that the American ambassador to Mexico ought to be disinterested in this matter. Here is an American citizen calling upon the American ambassador to intercede for him with the Mexican Government, to appeal to the Mexican Government for justice in his behalf, where the American citizen claims that the Mexican Government has not done him justice; and yet that ambassador, it is alleged, has interests in mining companies in Mexico which make it to his interest to appeal for favors to the Mexican Government, the Government which he must antagonize to some extent in pleading the cause of an American citizen who has been condemned by the Mexican Government, calling upon them to reverse their action, showing them the injustice of their action, showing them the justice of the cause of the American citizen. And yet it is alleged that he is interested in mining interests there, which makes it incumbent upon him to go before the Mexican Government for favors.

I do not know whether that be true or not; I care nothing, so far as this question is concerned, whether it be true or not; but it illustrates the proposition that the officer who is to do his duty must not have his duty on one side and his interest on the other. It illustrates the proposition that if his duty and his interest conflict, or are likely to conflict by any law, that that law ought to provide that his interest shall be eliminated.

And so this bill ought to provide that no Senator or Representative shall be the recipient of a bounty. No Senator ought to vote a bounty to himself. No Senator can do so conscientiously. He is not a fair judge in his own case. No Representative in Congress should vote a bounty to himself. He can not vote impartially if he is interested, nor can a President decide impartially the question whether the bill ought to be signed or vetoed if his duty is on one side and his interest on the other, if he is interested in the result of the bill. I mean directly, because of course everybody is interested in an indirect way in all the laws enacted by the Congress of the United States. The President is indirectly interested in the laws because he is interested in having good laws for the Government of the United States, he being a citizen of the United States. What I mean is that if he is directly interested, he can not be impartial in considering the question whether he ought to sign the bill or veto it. For that reason I hope the amendment will be adopted.

There is one other thing I want to say which occurs to me. It slipped my memory a while ago. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] said if this bill shall be enacted into law—I am not giving his exact language, but this is the substance—within five years there will be under construction in this country $50,000,000 of shipping. I can not find it, but that is the substance of what he said. I have shown here that at this time there are $63,000,000 of orders for shipping on hand in 7 of the 46 shipbuilding establishments of the United States, the report of the Commissioner of Navigation being the judge of the number of establishments and the prospectus of this shipbuilding trust being the judge as to the number of orders in these establishments.

Mr. President, I am as anxious for the American flag to float over the seas as any Senator on this floor. I have as much pride in it as any Senator on this floor. But I do not want it to float at the expense of injustice to the vast mass of the taxpayers of the country. The money that gets into the Treasury must get there some way out of the pockets of the people. It does not get there out of anybody else's pocket. No foreign people are going to pay the taxes for the administration of our Government. The money does not drop into the Treasury from above. It gets into the Treasury by indirect taxation and by direct taxation. It gets in there by the addition of the price of the customs taxes to the price of the goods of foreign manufacture that are sold to our people under the customs-revenue system. It gets there under the excise system, by indirection to be sure, but all the internal-revenue collections are paid by the consumers. They are nominally paid by the manufacturers of tobacco, for instance, or by the manufacturers of liquor. They are nominally paid by the man who takes out the license for carrying on the business, but at last they are paid by the consumer.

This money being obtained in this way, the tax upon the people of the United States is not equitable and just, because the man who owns a small amount of property, $500 worth of property, $1,000 worth of property, $5,000 worth of property, is compelled to have and to consume a certain amount of goods for himself and for his family to keep up his existence and their existence. When he does so, he pays a large tax upon them. He pays it indirectly, to be sure, but he pays it just as surely as if he were to pay it directly. The man who is worth hundreds of millions of dollars does not pay in proportion to the man who is worth a small amount of money. The large capitalist, the multimillionaire, does not pay in proportion to the laborer the customs taxes and the excise dues.

This money gets into the Treasury in this way. The people pay it indirectly, as I have said. When you take it out of the Treasury and give it to the men engaged in shipping you are taking the money out of the pockets of the laboring men, the poor men, the men of moderate means and giving it to the capitalists. It is not needed to benefit the shipbuilding in the United States, because the facts which have been put in evidence in this debate develop the truth that we are now on the rising tide of our great shipping industry. Heretofore the ships that have been built have been absorbed in our coasting trade and in our inland trade; but there is a sufficient number of ships to carry that trade, and now the shipping industry is going out over the ocean and large steamers are being built—four, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, aggregating 60,000 tons—so there is no need for this subsidy to encourage our shipping industry, and whatever subsidy is given is that much money taken out of the Treasury of the United States to contribute to the dividends of those who are growing rich in the business.

Our manufacturers compete with foreign capital and foreign manufacturers, notwithstanding the fact that the laborers in our factories are getting higher wages than are paid in England or other foreign countries. We compete successfully with them not only at home, but we carry our commerce to their very doors and sell it cheaper than they do. Our products, manufactured by labor that is paid higher wages, better wages, safer wages than are paid by foreigners, are carried to their doors. Steel rails, engines, woolen goods, cotton goods, all the products of our factories, are taken to foreign ports and there compete, after paying the expense of transportation, with the foreign products. Why is it that the shipping industries of the United States can not do the same thing?

A little while ago the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] read a letter from Mr. Baker, the president of the Atlantic Transport Line, which will be found in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, and that letter showed that Mr. Baker had contracted to have built certain steamers in the shipyards of the United States and duplicate them in the shipyards of England. Mr. Baker claims that it costs $700,000 more to build a ship in the United States than in England; and then the Senator said this was not the opinion of anybody; that he did not want any opinion; that what he wanted was facts, and he stated this as being a cold, established fact where there was no controversy about it.

Now, I want to say this in reference to Mr. Baker: Mr. Baker, of course, if this bill shall pass, will be a recipient of these bounties. He is therefore an interested witness. In the next place, Mr. Baker says that in order to test the difference he contracted with the American shipyards and with the British shipyards and found the difference in favor of the British shipyards.

What should cause us to scrutinize his testimony rather carefully, it seems to me, is that it is very unreasonable that a president of a transport line should actually have to make the contract in order to test the difference. If you go into a store for the purpose of buying an article of merchandise and price it, and go into another store for the same article of merchandise and price it, you have the difference there just as well without buying it as if you had bought it.

Mr. HANNA. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. He makes the statement that Mr. Baker made the contract in order to test the difference in the cost. I should like to know where he finds the authority for saying that that was the purpose for which he made the contract?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If that was not the purpose, will the Senator state what it was?

Mr. HANNA. The Senator said that in order to test the difference between the cost of construction in American shipyards and British shipyards he made this contract; that the purpose of his making the contract was in order to make a test case.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator state what his purpose was?

Mr. HANNA. I am not stating it. I am asking the Senator where he gets the authority for that statement?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. His letter is all the authority I have.

Mr. HANNA. That he made the contract for the purpose of making a test?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I infer that from his letter.

Mr. HANNA. I do not think a man would go on and make a contract for four or five ships for the sake of making such a test when one ship would answer the purpose.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That is exactly what I was saying. It was that that put me to questioning his testimony. One of the rules of deciding as to the worth and merit of the testimony of a witness is whether he is an interested witness or not. If he is an interested witness, we take it with a grain of salt. Then another rule of testing the weight of a witness' testimony is the reasonableness or unreasonableness of it; and that is exactly what I was saying, that it is an unreasonable proposition that he should make that kind of a contract. Now, will the Senator say that Mr. Baker simply wanted to pay $400,000 more for the American-built ship than he did for the British ship? Will the Senator say that the shipbuilder, the president of this transport line——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly. I want to get all the information I can about this matter.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Baker, in a letter to the New York Times, stated as his reason for contracting for six ships in American yards that at that time he believed that Congress was going to do something to encourage the merchant marine, and while he contracted for eight ships abroad, he concluded to take the risk of making contracts for six ships in American yards. He also says in the same letter that if that turns out to be a failure and Congress does not encourage the merchant marine he will be obliged to put these six American-built ships under a foreign flag, as he can not afford to sail them under the American.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Now, I understand from the Senator from Maine that Mr. Baker is speculating in prospective legislation of the Congress of the United States to the extent of millions of dollars. It would have been certainly as easy for Mr. Baker to have waited to determine whether this bill was going to pass or not. Men of good business tact, in my judgment, do not pay a larger sum for the construction of any article when they can get it constructed for a less sum somewhere else.

As I was going on to say, there was no necessity for Mr. Baker to make this contract in order to ascertain the difference in price. This is an interested witness. His statement about it is unreasonable. Why is it that Mr. Baker did not have all these ships built in American shipyards if he believed it was a fact and was willing to base his money on it that the Congress of the United States would give him a bounty? To put it in the mildest shape, Mr. Baker is having his ships constructed with a view of having the United States Government pay for their building, or at least for a large proportion of their building.

Right here I wish to say a word in reference to putting American-built ships under foreign flags. I have not examined the report of the Commissioner of Navigation thoroughly. I have not read it entirely through, because until a day or two ago I did not expect to make any speech on the bill other than to suggest some thoughts in reference to the amendment which I introduced. But I am told it is stated by the Commissioner of Navigation that there has been no case where an American-built ship has ever been put into foreign register. If that is not true, I have been so told by a Senator who is very familiar with this question.

Mr. President, let us compare the testimony of two witnesses. I have shown that Mr. Baker is interested, because he expects to get the bounty under this bill. I have shown that his statement is unreasonable. Now, let us take the testimony of another witness, and I suppose what he says about it is as much a fact as what Mr. Baker says. Mr. Cramp, one of the largest shipbuilders, as is stated in the report of the minority of the committee, the largest shipbuilder in the United States, says in answer to a question that was put to him:

> The proper form in which to put the question is, Can you build a ship to do the work of the City of New York or the Majestic or the Columbia in all respects for the same cost? To that question I would reply: "Yes; or within as small a margin as would be likely to prevail in a similar case between any two British shipyards."

There is the testimony of a man who is engaged in shipbuilding. I suppose he knows as much about it as Mr. Baker, the president of the Atlantic Transport Line. That is his testimony, and he is disinterested, because he is not expecting to get any bounty on any ship to be built under the provisions of this bill. It can not be said that he is interested in the prevention of the passage of the bill except as an American citizen is interested in seeing justice done between citizen and citizen of the United States. It can not be said that he will be harmed by the passage of this proposed act, because if, as is claimed, there is a decadence in shipbuilding in this country, as he is a shipbuilder, if the bill is intended to promote and will promote the building of ships, he will be benefited by it. So his testimony, so far from benefiting him, would be against him, and it is worth more than the testimony of a witness who testifies that it will benefit his case.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Cramp was theorizing a bit in a magazine. When he made his next contract with the American Line to build two ships, he charged them for the building just $1,100,000 more than they could have been built for in the English shipyards.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. For whom did he build those ships?

Mr. FRYE. He built them for the American Line.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Well, the American Line, I thought, were pretty good business people, but they are not very good business people if they paid a million one hundred thousand dollars more for building two ships than they could have had them built for somewhere else. If that is true, it must argue that the shipbuilding industry was at a pretty good stage of prosperity in the United States, and if he did not have plenty of business on hand he would not have forced such a favorable bargain to himself and such an unfavorable bargain to the American Line. Now, let us see what he says:

> It is the fact—

Says Mr. Cramp—

> that the "first cost" of ships is not only not a prime factor, but it is not even a serious factor in any competition that may occur between this country and Great Britain for a share of the traffic of the ocean.

This was ten years ago, it will be remembered.

> American shipyards have built or are building about 40 naval vessels of numerous rates and types, all of the very highest and effective class in the world; and this development has been crowded into a space of about seven years. * * *

The disparity of cost of naval ships between our yards and those of Great Britain, ton for ton, gun for gun, and performance for performance, has dwindled in seven years until, in the case of the three latest battle ships, the margin between our classes and those of similar construction abroad may be expressed by a very small figure. * * *

Now listen—

If the current policy of naval reconstruction be pursued for another decade (1902), coupled with a vigorous and consistent execution of the measures recently enacted in behalf of the merchant marine, the question which forms the subject of this paper will be asked no more; unless, indeed, its point should be reversed and Englishmen be asking one another, Can we build ships as economically as they can in the United States?

The fact that all the shipyards of the United States are crowded with work, the fact that they have contracts for years ahead, the fact that seven of them have contracts aggregating $63,000,000, on which the net profit is expected of $7,000,000, shows that his prediction is right and that the question will soon be asked one Englishman by another whether they can construct ships for as little cost and as economically as they can be constructed in the United States by American shipbuilders.

Now, Mr. President, I put this witness against Mr. Baker. I put a disinterested witness against an interested witness. I put a witness who will get none of the bounty under this proposed act against one who is expected to get the benefit of the bounty under it. I do not know whether that is a fact or not, but it certainly is worth as much as a fact as the statement of Mr. Baker.

As I said before, I am as anxious to see the American flag honored abroad as anybody. I am in favor of giving that encouragement to it which can be given in justice to all the people of the country and under the Constitution of the United States. But I am not in favor of giving to a private citizen the private property of other private citizens. I would prefer going abroad and not seeing the American flag at all to seeing it float over ships and at the same time remember that those ships are receiving as contributions to their dividends, not for the purpose of keeping them up but actually as contributions to the dividends of their owners, money from the American Treasury and from the hard earnings of the American people, money which can not, in my judgment, be constitutionally extracted from the people of the United States by the process of legitimate taxation. I would rather see no ship afloat than to see a ship that is tainted with the stain of money that does not legitimately belong to its owners.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the impression seems to prevail that this bill is going to pass, notwithstanding the arguments that may be offered against it and notwithstanding the general objections which were held on both sides to the subsidy bill which was under consideration last winter. Some of those objections are glossed over in this bill, but the principle underlying the two is absolutely the same. The people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here were very much interested in the consideration of the former bill, and they are interested now in this bill, in knowing what are its purposes and why the public money should be taken from the Treasury in this manner. I desire, therefore, to go upon record as to my views upon this subject.

The bill at present under consideration is professedly a bill to provide for our foreign mail service and the common defense; also to promote our commerce and the deep-sea fisheries. Although it is not a large bill in point of size, it is open to an unusually large number of objections, so many in fact that it is a physical impossibility for anyone to discuss them all within the limits of an ordinary Senatorial address. I shall not by any means attempt to cover the whole ground, therefore, but shall confine myself to a review of some of the more salient objections, just as they happen to occur to me and without much reference to the consecutive arrangement of the topics in the bill.

I must confess that in reading the majority report, and especially the eloquent exordium, the first thought that presented itself to my mind was that contained in the threadbare quotation—

The lady doth protest too much.

And on further reflection and analysis of this remarkable measure, which is to give us the control of the Pacific and the Atlantic, to secure for us the best ocean mail service in the world, to send our victorious fleets to the four quarters of the globe, to crowd every sea with American shipping, and to transfer the shipbuilding of Germany and Great Britain to the United States, another quotation occurred to me as being very relevant, which it seemed to me might well be inserted at the head of the bill, as a kind of text or motto—our old friend Mulberry Sellers's patriotic aspiration:

The old flag—and an appropriation.

Against this text or principle of the bill and its supporters I would select as the text of the opposition a decision of the United States Supreme Court. This decision goes to the root of the matter and relates to the abstract principle of right or wrong which is involved in this bill, as it must necessarily be involved in every bill.

In Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wallace, 655, 664) the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, said:

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or State." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes," citing Cooley on Constitutional Limitations.

Coulter, J., in Northern Liberties v. St. John's Church (13 Pa. Stat., 104), says, very forcibly:

"I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition, levied by the authority of the government for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose."

We have established, we think, beyond cavil that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose. It may not be easy to draw the line in all cases so as to decide what is a public purpose in this sense and what is not.

It will at once be said, of course, that this bill is for a public purpose, because it is claimed that it will benefit the whole people. Even if it should benefit the whole people, Mr. President, it is none the less a private bill—a plan (to use the language of the decision just quoted) for bestowing a large amount of public money "upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes." The "favored individuals," or at all events the most favored individuals, in this case, are the members of the International Navigation Company and some other ocean mail lines; the "private enterprises" are these companies and our American shipbuilders; the "private fortunes" to be built up are these same shipbuilders and owners of fast mail steamers. Such legislation as this is generally termed, in mild, courteous, and parliamentary language, "class legislation." Sometimes, in a spasm of indignation, it is referred to as "unjust favoritism." Justice Miller, it is seen, went further than this and said it was not legislation at all, but a despotic "decree under legislative forms." In fact, he went even further and called it "robbery."

It is proposed now by the advocates of the bill to take the public money—that is, to tax the people—for the building up of the shipping interests of this country, for assisting the shipbuilders and shipowners to make money and become wealthy. As Justice Miller well observed, such use of the public funds is not taxation. Taxes are legitimately imposed and collected only for the support of the Government or for other public purposes, and they can not legitimately or rightfully be imposed or collected for any other purpose.

At the outset, therefore, this bill encounters the grave objection of illegality and unconstitutionality; and if all parties and all lawmakers had equal respect for the law and Constitution, as they ought to have, the fate of the bill would be decided at once without further parley. But the dominant party, to which most of the friends of this bill belong, has never been celebrated for troubling itself much about questions of constitutionality. Accordingly, it will be necessary for its opponents to criticise the bill, not only in the abstract, but also in the concrete; not only theoretically, but also practically; not only as a whole, but in detail.

Aside from the carrying of the mails, the only vestiges of public usefulness to be found in the bill are the provisions relating to auxiliary cruisers and the employment of American seamen.

All the talk about merchant vessels being useful as auxiliary cruisers is utterly idle. In time of war such vessels may be made use of as transports under naval protection, but they are evidently not fit for cruisers. A cruiser, in order to be successful, must possess both great speed and great strength. Speed alone is not sufficient now, as it was in former times. The fastest merchant vessels in the world are much slower than the torpedo-boat destroyers and no faster than the latest battle ships, and would soon be overtaken and destroyed unless so strong in construction as to be practically invulnerable—regular floating fortresses, like the battle ships themselves. No merchant vessel is constructed in such a fashion as that. No passenger or freight steamer in existence or hereafter to be built could escape by flight from the enemy's swift pursuers, nor could they avoid destruction thereby. The case could not be better stated than it was in the Reform Club's reply to Commissioner Chamberlain's argument for the subsidy bill of last year. The reply, after stating the conditions which prevailed formerly, when merchant and naval vessels were more equally matched, and after showing what an advance had taken place in naval construction of late years, went on to say:

The modern merchant steamer, armed or unarmed, would be absolutely at the mercy of a modern naval vessel. She could neither inflict injury on the warship nor could she run away. Merchant steamers are not only of no use as fighting vessels, but the existence of large fleets of these ships makes it necessary to provide naval protection for them wherever they go; that is, instead of being defenders they are hostages to a possible enemy.

In other words, instead of being defenders, they require to be defended.

The creditable part played by some armed merchant steamers in the Spanish war is not a precedent which can safely be followed. We were dealing with an enemy, who were hopelessly outclassed in point of ability to fight and to handle guns and ships. In the two great naval battles of the Spanish war, where the Spanish fleets engaged were destroyed, only one American sailor was killed. Any unarmored vessel may safely brave such gunnery as this, but the fact that she is not destroyed does not prove that vessels of her class are fit to meet a navy really trained to its business. The element of national defense has, therefore, no place in the discussion of this question, whether to give or not to give a ship subsidy.

A valuable collection of facts regarding the operation of the French ship bounties was recently forwarded to the State Department by Mr. A. M. Thackara, our consul at Havre, and was published in volume 18 of the Special Consular Reports. In Mr. Thackara's report we notice the following statement by Mr. Charles Roux, a former deputy from Marseille and an authority on naval matters:

We must not place too much confidence in the fighting qualities of mail steamers armed as auxiliary cruisers. However excellent a cruiser of this kind may be, it would not take five minutes for the most ordinary battle ship or armored cruiser, with a well-directed shot, either to sink her or to place her in a disabled state that would surely lead to her capture. We admit that the auxiliary cruisers can be used in the movement of troops, but we firmly hope that a minister of the navy would never dare to embark 1,200 to 1,500 men on a vessel of this class to transport them to some distant point, leaving the ship to protect itself with its own armament in case of attack. He would have her convoyed: he would surround her with war vessels which would be ready to defend her in case of need. To act otherwise would be an imprudent folly.

Now, as to the tremendous impetus given by the bill to American seamanship, let us see what that amounts to. In the first place, the bill requires only one-quarter of the crew to be Americans, under the mail subsidy, for two years, and then one-third of the crew for three years more, and after five years one-half of the crew, while under the general subsidy it requires only one-quarter of the crew to be Americans for all time to come. This question as to American sailors, Mr. President, is greatly misunderstood. What is the reason why American sailors are so scarce now, in comparison with former times? One reason is that American boys and young men have found something better to do. They have found that they do better on land. In this free and progressive country boys can go into business in the towns and cities and work their way up to the top, and they prefer to do so rather than go to sea and to risk their lives in the hard and unprofitable life of a sailor.

So the provision of this bill in this regard would be, I fancy, quite difficult to carry out, even with the best intentions on the part of shipowners. If there were 100 or 1,000 new American vessels constructed next year under this bill, I doubt if the necessary quota of a quarter crew of American sailors for each of them could be obtained for love or money. Here, again, I quote briefly from the same document just mentioned:

The cause for the relatively small number of American sailors is a matter of wages; that is, Americans will not ship at the prices paid foreigners. They can earn more ashore than at sea at prevailing rates. The way to secure American seamen is, therefore, to tempt them by increased wages; and if the ship subsidy bill provided for any such increase and imposed some restrictions which would secure payment to the sailor and would prevent the shipowner from applying the Government aid to increase his profits, the bill would create a condition—although an artificial condition—which would increase the number of American sailors. But the bill contains no provision whatever with respect to the wages of seamen and no adequate guaranty that American seamen shall be employed. The owner, therefore, by reducing wages to the point at which Americans will not ship, can obtain a cheaper crew of foreigners.

Another reason for the present scarcity of American sailors is that sailors of the old-fashioned sort have become very scarce all over the world. Of course they are as numerous as ever on sailing vessels; but in all countries except our own the sailing vessel is rapidly being superseded by the steam vessel, and in our own country the same is true with regard to vessels intended for the foreign trade, which are the only vessels considered in this bill. Now, in former years there were still a good many sailors of the old style to be found on the steamers. The steamers of twenty or thirty years ago carried almost as much sail as a full-rigged ship, and sailors were busily employed on them all day and all night long in hoisting, lowering, and trimming these sails. But the steamers constructed nowadays have scarcely anything to do with sails. They carry masts and sails, but only for use when the machinery breaks down. Even the slow freight steamers rarely bother themselves about sails. Consequently there are few or no sailors, properly so called, on our modern steamers. As the Senator from Missouri well said the other day:

The sailor of to-day is the fireman, the stoker, the engineer. The few sailors who are found upon our steamships are now in the hold of the ship; and with the change of construction has come a change in the nature of our seamen.

When an American lad on our seacoast fifty years ago looked out upon the blue waters, there was something attractive to him in a life on the ocean wave; and, besides, there was no such disparity then as there is now between the rewards of labor on the land and labor on the sea. But now our young men, if they decide to follow the sea, must as a rule go down into the hold and shovel coal and ashes. No wonder they prefer to stay on land.

Thus vanish away these two vague and lonely vestiges of public usefulness in the bill, as I have already termed them.

I pass now to another point—the pretense of the examples of other nations—on which the champions of this bill greatly rely. This is a mere pretense and nothing else.

Take, first, the pretense of the alleged great ship subsidies paid by Great Britain. In point of fact Great Britain has never paid any real subsidy for shipbuilding, and her vast shipping interests and merchant marine have been built up without any such artificial aid. Great Britain pays, and has paid for many years past, a large amount of money, amounting of late years to four or five millions of dollars annually, for carrying her foreign mails across the oceans and small seas and channels separating her from the Continent. But in the case of these mail payments Great Britain simply pays for actual service rendered, and the deficit between the amount paid and the amount realized from foreign postage, perhaps two millions annually, is chargeable to the account of colonial government and is not properly to be considered as expended for the encouragement of shipbuilding. Payment for carrying mail should not be a subsidy, but a fair payment for work done. Legitimate mail pay is not properly subsidy at all. The word "subsidy" in this connection should be a misnomer. And the objection to the mail-subsidy feature of the pending bill is not that money is appropriated for the carriage of the ocean mails, but because the money appropriated for that purpose is excessive, as I shall hereafter show.

In regard to the British policy, our consul-general at London, Mr. William M. Osborne, recently reported as follows:

The Government of this country does not pursue any particular policy for the purpose of promoting its merchant marine. Subventions are paid for the use of certain vessels as armed cruisers in case of war, and payments are made for the carriage of mail.

These naval subventions amount now to about $300,000 a year. This, with the mail payments, is all that Great Britain does for her vast shipping interests. The case is still more definitely stated in a recent report by Mr. W. J. Sulis, our vice-consul at Liverpool. He says:

The Government does nothing to promote the merchant marine in the way of subsidizing it or the builders who construct it. Payments aggregating some $243,000 per annum are made to four companies for the call of certain steamers as armed cruisers in case of war, of which the two great trans-Atlantic companies receive about $72,900, the Pacific and Oriental Steamship Company $55,890, and the Canadian Pacific Company $36,450 toward the fast service between Vancouver and Australia. The number of steamers subsidized is 11, but the Admiralty has a further right to call upon 14 other steamers for transport service. The mail subsidies for the current year (1899) amount to $3,815,100, toward which the colonies and India contribute $850,500. This is exclusive of South Africa. These services are put up to competition and the cheapest bidder, having regard to efficiency, secures the contract.

In passing we may observe by the way that this shows, among other things, that there is a healthy competition for ocean mail service in that country, so that the contract for carrying the ocean mails can be kept down to a proper and reasonable figure. In this country, on the other hand, although the bill specifies that proposals for carrying the mails shall be thrown open to competition, it is well known that there will be but one possible bidder on each of the great routes, and that the contracts will be secured by those bidders at their own prices, which have hitherto been fully twice as large as the corresponding amounts are in Great Britain and fully twice as large as the prices which we would have to pay foreign companies for carrying the same mails on much faster and more reliable steamers. This very point, Mr. President, is the crux of the whole situation, so far as the mail subsidy part of the bill is concerned.

The example of France is often cited; but the experience of that country argues against rather than in favor of the subsidy system. France has been giving large direct bounties or subsidies to shipbuilders and shipowners for forty years, the amounts increasing steadily and gradually until they are now about $9,000,000 annually; but notwithstanding this her shipping refuses to increase to any proportional extent. Her steam merchant marine is now only about 1,000,000 tons, which is less than the United States has to show, and the shipbuilding activity in France at present is far behind our own shipbuilding activity. In the fiscal year of 1901 France added 53,000 tons to her steam merchant marine and the United States added 215,000 tons. It is altogether probable that the statistics for the present fiscal year will make a still better showing for the United States in comparison with highly subsidized France.

The report of Mr. Thackara, already quoted from, contains many figures and statements bearing on this point. He says, among other things:

It has been shown that the support given to the steam fleet of France, by means of the bounties granted by the law of 1893, has not developed that branch of the merchant navy to the extent hoped by the projectors of the law. * * * It is evident that the law of 1893, enacted for the purpose of improving the efficiency of the French merchant marine, has not accomplished its purpose. Many protests have been made against the workings of this law, and demands have been heard that the law be either repealed or that it be materially changed. The shipowners ask that the half bounty formerly allowed to vessels of foreign construction and registered under the French flag be restored. The question arises, why should French shipowners desire to purchase their vessels in foreign countries, especially in England? This question is answered as follows in the report of the committee on the budget of the minister of commerce for 1899: "This preference has several causes. The English shipbuilder is able to obtain his iron, coal, machinery, and labor at a better price than ours. Besides, an English shipyard will deliver a vessel in nine months which would take twenty and even thirty months in a French shipyard. * * * Cheapness and quick delivery have decided our owners to buy their ships in foreign markets."

Mr. Robert P. Skinner, our consul at Marseille, also made a report recently which contains information bearing on these points, from which we quote:

The law (of 1893) stands to-day, although its amendment is probable. * * * Its effect was to divide the interests of shipowners and shipbuilders. The former, at first disposed to give orders to domestic builders, found the latter constantly increasing their prices, until the point was reached where the builders were accused of calculating the amount of premium which proposed constructions would command and adding that amount to their own cost price, thus absorbing the premium for navigation and the one for construction. * * * The Society (for the Defense of Commerce) urges the passage of the proposed law giving premiums to foreign-built ships. It argues: "To buy foreign-built ships will be to pay to foreigners a tribute much less than the amount we now pay in freight. The freight charges, once paid, are lost forever, while the foreign-built ship diminishes in nothing the national wealth and gives employment to a numerous population."

M. Bernard, president of the Compagnie Nantaise de Navigation, said to the parliamentary commission: "By the law of 1893 the French shipbuilders have not only gained an excessive protection—they have a monopoly. * * * Five years ago the shipowners in Germany were tributary to the English yards. To-day the German builders execute as well and as quickly, and seek outside orders for less, at times, than those who were for years their masters. One can count to-day 29 German shipyards which rival the greatest British yards, while our own yards, by common consent, are in a state of notorious inferiority. The Germans, first of all, created their material. They bought where best they could the ships they needed. Little by little, at first for the maintenance of their ships and then for their renewal, the German yards increased, and to-day produce shipping on conditions comparable with those of Great Britain."

So it will appear that the experience of France with ship subsidies, according to the testimony of our own officials and of her own best authorities, has been anything but satisfactory, and that even with the protection of a very high subsidy the French have been compelled to look to England for the production of her ships on any profitable scale. It also appears that the first steps taken by Germany on the road toward a healthy, self-supporting merchant marine was the judicious purchase of ships built in a foreign market.

The experience of Sweden and Norway is also striking and convincing. That composite nationality pays only about $150,000 for the ocean mails and about $25,000 more for general subsidy purposes; and with the aid of this very modest expenditure on the part of the State the enterprising and hardy Norwegians and Swedes, mainly by the exercise of their own individual energy and skill, have become a first-class sea power and have built up a merchant marine much larger than that of France, with her hothouse system of forcing shipbuilding by the aid of subsidies.

In respect to the general history of subsidies, which is exceedingly instructive to every student of public affairs, I perhaps could not do better than repeat here some statements and considerations which I put forth recently in another quarter, and which I would therefore reiterate at this point:

[From Collier's Weekly].

In early history the term subsidy was applied to a special land tax, usually of about one-fifth of the normal rental. In the latter part of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century it denoted payments to an ally for assistance in carrying on war, but its modern use has been applied to any direct pecuniary aid rendered by the state to industrial enterprises. In its wisest sense it includes all such government aid as, for instance, the system of bounties on exports, which holds so important a place in the commercial policy of France. The First Congress of the United States, in 1789, imposed discriminating duties upon goods imported under a foreign flag, as well as a heavy tonnage tax. It further secured monopoly right by providing that none but American-built vessels should receive an American register and sail under the American flag. This law still holds good, and without doubt to it can be directly attributed much of the decline of the American merchant marine. A few years later the railroads which began springing up throughout the new country tried to persuade Congress to grant to them bounties and discriminations similar to those it had allowed the shipping industry, but even at that early date it was seen that it was not wise to extend such privileges.

The ship-subsidy scheme is not an untried experiment. Twice before, on a large scale, the United States Government has attempted it, but in both cases it was a sad failure, and was connected with a disgraceful chapter of Federal legislation. In 1850 the Government granted a subsidy of $385,000 to the Collins Line to ply between Liverpool and New York. From that date to 1859, when the company went out of existence in disaster, its ocean territory was repeatedly broadened and the subsidy raised until it reached $2,000,000, yet, despite it all, the project failed. Nor was the case of the Pacific Mail Company, in 1865-1875, any more successful. Fraud and misuse of funds was the record of both enterprises. Dr. Hadley, of Yale, says: "While the subsidized steamers are useful in providing a reserve in case of war, their commercial success is always doubtful. Experience proves that the system of bounties calls unnecessary ships into operation and diminishes the regular earnings of the business, for which the Government bounty furnishes scant compensation. It has caused waste instead of economy, loss rather than gain."

We hear it constantly quoted that Great Britain has built up the largest merchant marine of the world by its generous grants of Government subsidies, and that for that reason we should emulate her example. This has led to a general misunderstanding of the subject. Great Britain gives no such subsidies as the ship-subsidy bill calls for, nor are the cases parallel. A hundred years ago all of the nations of the globe were using wooden vessels for their ocean traffic. With our unbroken and limitless forests, reaching to the very sea edge, and with labor to be had for the asking, our shipbuilding industry forged to the front. For many years our merchant marine led the sails on all seas. But with the introduction of steam and steel craft, England, with its then larger supply of iron and steel, soon surpassed us in shipbuilding, and with our restricted navigation laws it was impossible for us to compete with her.

Steam craft were an experiment, and as an experiment Great Britain, in about 1838, began granting ship subsidies. This was rendered necessary by her large and far-separated colonies. The subsidies were continued under the Admiralty until 1860, but by that time the system had become so notoriously corrupt that it was taken entirely out of the control of the Admiralty and transferred to the post-office department of the Government. The system of private contracts was abolished; the whole enterprise was thrown open to public competitors; and the entire grant of subsidies was reduced to the carriage of ocean mails and the maintenance of the marine reserves. From that day to this this has been the extent of Great Britain's ship subsidies, and it is worthy of note that under these circumstances the Inman and other unsubsidized lines of England have paid as well as those which have received the Government grants.

It should be borne in mind that subsidies always mean increased taxation and that the ship subsidy of the proposed law will be no exception to the rule. Could it be shown that the beneficiary was an infant industry that needed Government aid, the reason for the introduction of the bill might be justifiable; but, as has been said, the chief beneficiaries of the law would be old and well-established fast passenger lines that have no more ground for asking for public money than have any of the prosperous merchants of any of our large cities. The legitimate object of taxation is public necessity. In what way can these steamship companies show that they are diving into the United States Treasury for "public necessity?" Verily, it has been said, with truth, "The bill would inaugurate as graceless a raid on the United States Treasury as was ever devised by human greed."

There is no necessity for the ship-subsidy law. The American merchant marine is bound in a very few years to become self-supporting without Government pap. If our antiquated and pernicious navigation laws could be remodeled and the restriction on foreign-built ships struck from the statute book, it would reach it with giant strides. The law against the registration of foreign-built ships under the American flag is a dead weight to competition. Give us free ships, and we could run them all over the waters of the globe and bid defiance to every competitor; but with the laws as they are there is no necessity for the ship-subsidy law. With our unlimited mines of steel, iron, and coal; with our abundant resources, not equaled elsewhere under God's canopy of blue, we are as certain as that day follows night to again take the leading place in the merchant marine of the world, as we are doing in every other branch of international commerce.

It is claimed that it costs more to build ships in the United States than in the maritime countries of Europe; that it costs more to run an American ship in wages and supplies, and that the European governments support their merchant-marine service by subsidies, against which our unsubsidized ships can not compete. Time is proving the fallacy of these claims. If the American shipping industry were in the sad plight the advocates of the ship-subsidy bill maintain, would our shipyards show their present flourishing condition? If the industry really does not pay, why do the International Company, the Atlantic Transport Company, the Pacific Mail, the Ward Line, and a dozen others that might be named continue to run? Surely it has not been purely a labor of love and mercy with them all of these years. Can it be that a broad philanthropy has incited them to remain in the business, although at a loss?

I repeat, there is no necessity for the ship-subsidy law. Never in our history have our shipyards been so busy. For the past two years they have been taxed to their utmost capacity to fill their increasing orders. Domestic shipbuilding has become a gigantic enterprise, and the present generation is sure to witness a marvelous growth of the American merchant marine. Not only are all shipyards busy now, but they are crowded with orders which extend over the next two years. New shipping docks are building, larger than any existing ones; old ones are enlarging their borders. Last year there was an addition to our merchant fleet of 420,000 tons gross, and 140,000 tons gross was used in the construction of war vessels. Besides this, 40,000 tons of ship plate was sold abroad, showing that it is only a matter of time until we will become the producing plant for even the maritime provinces of Europe.

The references which I have here made to the cost and condition of shipbuilding in America bring up for consideration another pretense on the part of the advocates of the pending bill, namely, that our American shipping and shipyards are in a languishing condition. In view of all the facts to the contrary which confront us on every hand this is a most extraordinary pretense. The last report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that there has been a steady and rapid increase in our American shipbuilding during the last five or six years, until it reached last year the highest development which it has attained since 1855. Some of the particulars of the great progress of this industry in our country during the last three years will be both instructive and interesting in connection with this point. The Blue Book of American Shipping for 1899 described the situation in that year in the following language:

No single year in the third of a century that has been consumed in the development of iron and steel shipbuilding in the United States has witnessed progression as rapid or the introduction of innovations as numerous or radical as that which has elapsed since the last issue of the Blue Book of American Shipping. American triumphs in the foreign-trade field are gradually convincing the people of the whole country that the development of our shipping interests is not a matter that concerns only the shipbuilder or shipowner.

The development of the American mercantile marine and the American shipbuilding industry have gone forward hand in hand, both stimulated by the greater industrial activity following the Spanish-American war; the shipbuilding industry benefited especially by the severe drain made by Government purchases of available tonnage for the auxiliary naval fleet.

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the Treasury Department, fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, will show a growth unprecedented in the history of shipbuilding in this country, and the figures for the year just opening will be even more interesting. There are now building in our shipyards for the United States and foreign countries more than 50 naval vessels, valued at upward of $40,000,000, exclusive of armor and armament, and more than 200 merchant vessels (no small craft of any kind included), the aggregate value of which exceeds $30,000,000.

There has been turned out in this single year an Atlantic coast fleet of respectable size, in which the Cromwell, Morgan, Ward, Merchants and Miners', Old Dominion, Plant, Old Bay, and almost all other principal coast lines have been represented. For Pacific coast service there are building more modern steel freight and passenger steamers than have been constructed in any three previous years combined. On the western rivers steel hulls have made their appearance, with promise of the river fleet being gradually rebuilt along steel lines. The shipyards of the entire country have, in fact, orders sufficient on hand to keep them in operation for periods ranging from one to three years. The largest merchant vessels and vessels of war ever constructed on this side of the Atlantic are now on the stocks in American yards. The principal steamship companies of the country has been compelled to place orders abroad by reason of inability to secure from any American builder a promise of delivery in anything like the time required. All the yards, great and small, are developing and expanding. At Newport News, Va., alone, the improvements under way will entail an expenditure of $2,000,000. A $3,000,000 shipyard is in progress of establishment on the Delaware, and another with a capital of $1,000,000 is projected. The Maryland Steel Company reopened its marine plant in obedience to a rush of work that enabled it to, six months later, have 7 steel steamers under construction. Southern energy embodied in the William R. Trigg Company converted Richmond, Va., into a shipbuilding port. The general extension of the use of pneumatic tools in the construction of steel vessels is a feature of the year's progress, as is also the more extended introduction of cantilever cranes and other equipment calculated to reduce costs by facilitating shipyard operations.

On the Great Lakes all the leading shipbuilding and dry-dock plants have been merged into the American Ship Building Company, one of the strongest of the recently formed industrial organizations, with a conservative policy, well defined, and with complete control still in the hands of the men who built up this industry in the lake region. This company already has in hand several orders for freight carriers of 9,000 net tons capacity on 18 feet draft, that are not to be delivered until May, 1900, but on which work must begin immediately, as they are to cost approximately $350,000 each, and with quadruple-expansion engines and water-tube boilers will represent the best practice that is to be found in shipbuilding anywhere in the world. A total value of about $6,000,000 is represented by all new tonnage now under way in shipyards of the Great Lakes, and there is every reason to expect that this aggregate will be kept up for a couple of years to come, notwithstanding the higher values now prevailing in labor, material, and supplies of all kinds. In short, it is the general opinion that under the influence of powerful corporations now controlling transportation affairs on the Great Lakes, practically the entire fleet is to be rebuilt on lines of the modern steel vessel.

The Cramps, of Philadelphia, and the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, have completed the first war vessels for foreign powers turned out from American shipyards in many years. The American "tramp" steamer has made its appearance. New England districts are again witnessing quite a little activity in the construction of wooden vessels, even to the placing of an order for a six-masted ship that is to carry 5,500 tons dead weight. * * * Finally the United States has learned much from the foreign shipbuilder and his kindred artisans, and seemingly the British shipbuilder is ready to accord more attention to the trend of events in this country. An American firm recently furnished to Belfast builders a large consignment of ship plate for the Oceanic, the largest vessel ever constructed, and the British technical journals are universal in the concession that in America is to be found the future rival of Great Britain as a shipbuilding and shipowning nation.

Also, the following extracts from the Blue Book of American Shipping for the following year, 1900:

The development in iron and steel shipbuilding, which was noted in the last issue of the Blue Book, continues with unabated energy. New shipyards are springing up along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The New York Shipbuilding Company is building a new plant at Camden, N. J., which will be one of the largest in the country. Work is being rushed, and the company expects to bid for the new battle ships and cruisers to be built by the United States Navy. Ship construction will be begun there some time during the present year. At New London, Conn., the Eastern Shipbuilding Company is erecting an immense plant. The works of this company are primarily established to build two cargo carriers for the Pacific trade for James J. Hill, of the Great Northern Railway. These carriers will be of 34,000 tons and will exceed in size anything afloat. Something of their size may be appreciated when it is said that they will be bigger than the Lucania and Campania put together, and will have about 5 acres of deck space. As profit-earning capacity and not speed is the end sought, they will be slow boats, designed for moderate coal consumption.

The Wm. R. Trigg Company, of Richmond, Va., is adding extensively to its plant, being now engaged in an outlay of $800,000 in improvements. The new equipment will make it one of the largest shipbuilding plants on the Atlantic coast. The Fore River Engine Company, of Weymouth, Mass., one of the latest in the field, has grown so rapidly that it has just purchased 60 acres of land at Quincy Point, Mass., 2 miles from its present site, for a new plant. The Cramps, at Philadelphia, have extended their works by the purchase of an adjoining shipyard, and the Newport News Company, at Newport News, Va., is just completing a very large dry dock and other additions to its plant. A healthful sign is the appearance of the American "tramp" steamer, which, nomad though it be, is the sure forerunner of a reviving merchant marine. The New England shipyards, too, are still building a type of very large sailing vessels, one of them a six-masted schooner, the largest that has ever been constructed. In the handling of that class of freight which depends more on economy of movement than promptness of delivery, these vessels will have a distinct field of usefulness.

Since the opening of Alaska the Pacific coast has received a decided impetus in shipbuilding. The Risdon Iron Works, of San Francisco, has engaged in general shipbuilding. They are equipping a plant of sufficient capacity to build the largest type of ships. The Wolff & Zwicker Iron Works, of Portland, Oreg., is contemplating the erection of a shipbuilding plant at St. Johns. At the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, additions and improvements of considerable importance have been made of late, and the same is true in a proportionate degree of the smaller works. The development of trade with the Orient will make the Pacific coast an important center in shipbuilding. Of that there are sufficient signs already.

As to the growth of shipbuilding in the United States during the last decade of the nineteenth century, the following table bears eloquent witness. It is a compilation by the chief statistician for manufactures in the Census Office, and is a part of the new census of 1900. This table shows that during the decade the capital invested in shipbuilding enterprises in the United States increased 181 per cent; the number of wage-earners employed in that business increased 108 per cent; the wages increased 86 per cent, and the value of products increased 93 per cent. The table follows:

	1900.	1890.	Per cent of increase.
Number of establishments	1,083	1,006	7.7
Capital	$76,699,651	$27,262,892	181.3
Wage-earners, average number	46,121	22,143	108.3
Total wages	$24,288,109	$13,033,949	86.4
Miscellaneous expenses	$3,592,257	$1,398,551	157.2
Cost of materials used	$53,031,280	$16,521,246	99.9
Value of products, including custom work and repairing	$73,444,753	$38,065,410	92.9

Finally, as to the figures for the last fiscal year, ended June 30, 1901, the report of the Commissioner of Navigation shows that the total tonnage of the United States at that date was, with one single exception, greater than ever before recorded, comprising 24,057 vessels, of 5,524,218 tons, and that in that fiscal year we built 1,580 vessels, of 483,489 tons, the greatest tonnage ever built in one year in this country since 1855. It is also stated that "construction during the current fiscal year promises nearly, if not quite, to equal the greatest in our history."

In his recent document on The Shipping Industry of the United States, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics bears similar witness. He states that—there are abundant proofs that capital has so far lost its attitude of reserve, if not timidity, toward shipping under American registry as to be entering upon a large-scale system of shipbuilding for the first time in our national history. We seem at last to be laying new and broad foundations for this great industry, for which nature and history has fitted us, and which has hitherto failed to develop at the desired rate.

In view of all this testimony, added to the official returns from shipyards printed recently in the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—returns which show in most cases that the shipyards are full of work—how can anybody assert that the American shipping industry and shipyards are in a languishing condition?

As to the mooted question of the cost of building ships in this country, on which the subsidy champions lay so much stress, that appears to me to be very easily disposed of. If the cost is as much greater here than in Europe as they contend, then not all the subsidy in the world will succeed in making an American merchant marine pay. If our ships are so much more expensive and cost so much more to navigate, they will demand higher freight and passenger rates, and must have them in order to maintain themselves. But people will not pay higher rates unless they are compelled to do so by law, and in such a case as is supposed the people would take passage and send their goods in the foreign vessels, which would offer cheaper rates. The American vessels, then, would be simply maintained by the subsidies, and those subsidies would be paid by the American people. In brief, the American people would be forced to pay out of their pockets the money for supporting these expensive American-built vessels, which could not support themselves on their own merits or without such assistance against competition by the less expensive foreign vessels. If this is not class legislation, surely there never was an instance of any.

Now, Mr. President, if the contrary is true, if it is not materially more expensive to build ships here, then no subsidy is needed or justified. And the latest figures and facts and occurrences all go to show that it is not more costly to build ships here than in Great Britain, or anywhere else. The crowded condition of our shipyards is one evidence of this; the figures of the current markets furnish further evidence. Steel, iron, and wood, and all other shipbuilding materials are now no more expensive here than they are abroad. Moreover, all such materials can be imported free of duty for shipbuilding purposes. Our plants are as complete as any in Europe. Our tools and machinery are better than those of Europe. Our workingmen are vastly better. They get higher wages, but they do much more in a given time, and do it much better, so that the factor of higher wages is thus eliminated. Here, again, we have the testimony of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics:

The experience of the last seven years has enabled manufacturers of steel ship plates to bring the price of this particular material below that which rules at Middlesborough, England, so that, even though the relative cost of ship plates may have only recently fallen below the price which British and Scotch shipbuilders have to pay, the fact remains that the achievement in this one direction has been accomplished, and no one acquainted with the manufacturing industries on which shipbuilding is dependent for other materials will deny that it is only a question of time when a corresponding reduction will have been accomplished in enough other divisions of manufacture to put the shipyards of the United States on an equal footing with those of Great Britain.

The statements as to the increased cost of shipbuilding in this country vary considerably, as all must have noticed. The Senator from Maine and several Senators put it at 30 or 35 per cent; some call it 25 per cent; Mr. Dickie, of the Union Iron Works, in a paper read at a meeting of the naval architects in New York, said it was about 15 per cent, and so on down. In the discussion which followed Mr. Dickie's paper, Mr. W. I. Babcock made the following important suggestions:

As a matter of fact, if we are able to ship steel to England, there is hardly any reason to suppose that through a long term of years the shipbuilders in this country will have to pay more for the same steel when they have not got the ocean freight against them. I do not think the question of material need to worry us at all in that respect. There remains only the cost of labor, and that is by far the most important of all. I must admit that I do not quite follow Mr. Dickie's figures here. He says that our total labor cost on a ship is 25 per cent more than the British cost, and also that the labor cost of the steel work of construction alone is about the same in both countries. With this latter statement I agree, for I arrive at the same conclusion from such information as I was able to obtain from there three years ago. On the lakes the labor on the steel work alone of a ship is about 32 per cent of the total cost of that ship, and all other labor, painting, carpenter and joiner work, and outfit (excluding propelling machinery) ranges from 7 per cent in a bulk-freight steamer to 12 per cent in a package-freight steamer, the latter meaning a boat with main deck, gangways, and hoisting machinery; and the former an ore, coal, or grain carrier.

Now, if the labor cost on the steel work is the same in both countries it is impossible that an addition of some 50 per cent to the cost of the other labor, which in any ship would be considerably less than that on the steel work, though perhaps not as much as on the lakes, would add 25 per cent to the total labor—that is, the labor on the hull is the principal labor on the ship, and Mr. Dickie says himself he thinks we can do that just as cheaply as they can on the other side—a steel hull. As I say, on the lakes the other labor is almost from 7 to 12 per cent of the total cost of the ship. Whatever you add to that is a very small proportion to add to the total labor. Mr. Dickie seems to think that the explanation of the equal costs in steel work lies in the piece-work system. But his own statement is that even on work supposed to be done by piece there is more day work than piecework. How, then, does he account for equal costs, even supposing piece rates are the same, when our day wages are so much greater—50 per cent he gives it, though I think it nearly 75 per cent? It seems to me the true explanation is that our men do much more work in a day, that they are very much steadier and lose a great deal less time, that the working day is better divided up, two periods instead of three, that our yards are better arranged and have better machinery, and our management is better. Now, if we can overcome the handicap in wages in steel work, why can we not do the same in everything else? We can. And all we want is work enough to keep our yards occupied all the time and a little more experience to prove it.

The mail-subsidy feature of the bill has been so thoroughly discussed already that I do not need to go into it extensively. As I said a while ago, the principal objection to the proposed mail subsidies is that they are too large. No one objects to a proper extension of the ocean mail service at a proper cost, but ever since 1891 we have been paying our American lines at least twice as much for such service as was proper or necessary, at least twice as much as Great Britain pays for similar service or as we pay foreign lines for carrying the excess mails which our American lines are not able to handle. A few figures from the official statistics will prove this statement.

In the last fiscal year the International Navigation Company (American Line) carried 71,000,000 grams of letter mail and 641,000,000 grams of printed matter, and was paid under the act of 1891 $528,537.

The Cunard Line (British) carried 137,000,000 grams of letters and 835,000,000 grams of printed matter, and was paid $213,103.

The White Star Line (British) carried 62,000,000 grams of letters and 326,000,000 grams of printed matter, and was paid $91,591.

In other words, we paid the American Line more than twice what we paid the Cunard Line for carrying not much more than half the amount of mail carried by the Cunard Line; and we paid the American Line about six times as much as we paid the White Star Line for carrying practically the same amount of mail matter.

On the Pacific the same discrepancy was noticeable. We paid the American Pacific Mail Line $52,533 for carrying 9,000,000 grams of letters and 118,000,000 grams of printed matter, and the British Occidental and Oriental Line $19,638 for carrying almost exactly the same amount of mail.

We also paid the New York and Cuban Company (American) about $200,000 for carrying 1,995 pounds of letters and 30,864 pounds of printed matter, which was at the rate of $6 a pound, whereas our rate for paying the foreign companies was only 44 cents per pound for letters and 4½ cents a pound for printed matter.

In addition to this, it must be taken into consideration that the foreign steamers were the quickest and the most frequent, and also that the pending bill proposes to still further increase the payments to American vessels for mail carriage by at least 30 per cent. These specimen figures are quite sufficient, in my opinion, to show the undesirable and inequitable nature of the mail-subsidy division of the bill.

I will not attempt, Mr. President, to go further into an analysis of this bill. Several other injurious features occur to me, which I will not take time even to mention. It occurs to me merely to refer to the omission of the former cargo clause, which would permit vessels to draw subsidies for going to sea without any cargo whatever or without any mail. Another point is that the bill makes no limit to the subsidy to be paid, as the former bill did. It is claimed that the amount to be derived from the bill at first would be only about $6,000,000 or so. But whatever the amount might be, there would inevitably be an extension of it as the years passed by. Such a bill as this, giving away the public money, and without any limit, will never tend toward smaller expenditures. Out in the Western country occasionally one comes across a grown-up ox which continues to bellow after its mother, and thereby creates general hilarity in all the region round about. This habit is due to a lack of proper discipline in its younger days, and the farmers have a saying that "such calves can never be weaned." This subsidy bill, Mr. President, is a calf that can never be weaned.

In brief, this bill ought not to pass because it is illegal and unconstitutional, being a scheme to spend the public money for the benefit of one particular industry; because it would not effect the objects which it proposes to effect, with regard to the promotion of commerce and the providing for the common defense; because its proposed subsidies for mail carriage are excessive and extravagant, and because the shipbuilding industry does not need and is not entitled to any such assistance. The shipbuilding industry is already protected far more than most of our industries. All materials from abroad that are used in the building of ships for the foreign trade are admitted to this country free of duty, no foreign vessel is permitted to engage in our coastwise trade, our Government is required to have all its naval vessels built in American yards, and our American mail-carrying vessels are paid at a rate more than double the rate received by foreign mail-carrying vessels.

These are but a few objections to the bill, and very imperfectly presented; but even so, Mr. President, I think they are amply sufficient to show beyond doubt or cavil that the bill should certainly be defeated.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado if it would suit his convenience to go on in the morning?

Mr. TELLER. I would rather proceed in the morning, if I can go on immediately after the routine morning business. I think I ought to do that if I yield the floor now.

Mr. KEAN and Mr. SPOONER. Give notice of it.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield now, and will resume the floor immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). No objection being heard, the Senator from Colorado will proceed with his remarks immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HERNY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LOAN OF TENTS TO TEXAS REUNION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 161, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Texas Reunion Associations.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the officers of the Texas Reunion Association such number of tents, poles, and pins as may be necessary for the accommodation of the Confederate reunion to be held at the city of Dallas, Tex., April 22 to April 25, 1902: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from such officers a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition; and the whole without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TOWN SITE OF BASIN CITY, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11053) providing for the issuance of patent to the town site of Basin, Wyo., to the municipal authorities thereof for the use and benefit of said town.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the properly constituted authorities of the town of Basin, Wyo., for the use and benefit of said town, a patent to all that portion of the east half of the northwest quarter and the west half of the northeast quarter of section 21, township 51 north, range 93 west of the sixth principal meridian, which has not been sold by the United States at the time of the passage of this act, the above-described tract being the town site of the said town of Basin.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 5, page 1, after the word "Basin," insert the word "City."

In line 1, page 2, after the word "Basin," insert the following:

"City: Provided, That separate patents shall be issued to Big Horn County, Wyo., for the court-house square, as shown upon the plat of said town, and to the properly constituted authorities of the school district in which the said town is located for the public-school square, as shown upon said plat."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill providing for the issuance of patent to the town site of Basin City, Wyo., to the municipal authorities thereof for the use and benefit of said town, and for other purposes."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to look the bill over. I will be glad if the gentleman would make some explanation and state the amount of land involved.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there are two general town-site laws. Under one of these laws the county judge of the county in which the proposed town site is situated enters the town site for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof, and payment is made to the Government of $1.25 to $2.50 an acre. Under that law every town site in the United States has been entered except the town site in question. When the people interested endeavored to have the town site entered under that law, they discovered that inasmuch as the county was not fully organized—there was no county judge—it would be impossible to have the town site established under that law.

As they were anxious for a town site, they entered the same under a law which provides for the establishment of a town site, the lots to be sold by the register and receiver of the land office and the proceeds to go into the Treasury of the United States. The amount of land entered was 160 acres. This land might have been entered, had the conditions been different, under the other town-site law for the sum of $200, or the land might have been homesteaded at a cost of $16.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it had been entered under the first arrangement, the Government would have received $200 only?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and as it is the Government has received $2,100 for these 160 acres.

We now ask that the unsold lots be patented to the town authorities for the benefit of the town, the court-house square be patented to the county authorities, and the schoolhouse square to the authorities of the school district.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has this been examined by the committee and recommended by the Commissioner of the Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. The committee reported unanimously. The Commissioner of the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior made no special recommendation on this bill. The first bill introduced provided for the patenting of all the land to the town, but the Commissioner suggested that the schoolhouse square and the court-house square should be patented to the proper authorities and not to the town.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, if they are satisfied with it, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill H. R. 11471, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. As the conference report, as everyone knows, is in technical language and not so easily understood, I will ask that the Clerk read the statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[For conference report see page 2712 of the RECORD.]

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11471) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report and each of the said amendments:

The amendment of the Senate raising the salary of the minister to Persia from $5,000 to $7,500 is disagreed to.

The salary of the secretary of the legation to Austria is increased $450, and of the second secretary of the same mission, which is to be elevated to an embassy, is provided for at $1,800.

Ten student interpreters at the Pekin legation, at $1,000 each, are to be selected in a nonpartisan manner, and who shall sign an agreement to continue in service as interpreters at legations and consulates so long as required within ten years.

Two thousand dollars is continued to provide for the International Prison Commission.

The post of secretary of legation to Belgium was created at $1,800 per year, the same as is paid at the adjoining and similar post, The Hague.

The salaries at Antwerp, Coburg, Munich, Lyons, Para (Brazil), Cologne, Lourenço Marquez (Africa), Belize, Geneva, Mannheim, Moscow, Rosario, Saltillo, St. Helena, are raised $500 each. Riga (Russia) is raised $250. Algiers (Africa), Ceiba (Honduras), posts now paid by fees, are salaried, respectively, at $1,500 and $1,000.

There are four increases of clerk hire, altogether amounting to $1,820.

The salary at Dawson City is retained at the same rate as it passed the House.

There is a decrease of $200 in the compensation of consular clerks.

The arrangements of the consular posts in alphabetical order which was adopted in the House bill was changed by the Senate restoring the old arrangement and to this your conferees assented.

Amount of estimates	$2,038,578.76
Amount of House bill	1,929,328.76
Increase by the Senate	34,696.93
Amount as passed by Senate	1,964,025.69
Reduction in conference	5,600.00
Amount as agreed in conference	1,958,425.69

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the managers, as just read, gives every detail so fully, and, I may add, details of points on which we had been disposed to agree in the House committee, but which we did not venture to put in the bill because of various considerations, that I do not think it necessary to take up the time of the House with any further explanation. The most important change was the one providing for ten student interpreters in China, but that is now safeguarded with such provision as we hope will secure their permanent services to the United States. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and resumed the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, Mr. LITTLEFIELD in the chair.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

Free-delivery service: For pay of letter carriers in offices already established, and for substitute letter carriers, and for temporary carriers at summer resorts, holiday, election, and emergency service, $17,430,450.

Mr. SWANSON (interrupting the reading). I want to reserve a point of order against all that part of the bill with reference to rural free delivery.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia reserves a point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire my point of order to apply to the paragraph beginning on line 14, page 10.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman desires to reserve a point of order upon this provision, he had better make it. He and myself, I thought, had a thorough understanding in regard to what was to be done. If the gentleman does not trust me, I insist on his making the point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not want the matter to get out of the control of myself——

Mr. LOUD. Well, if the gentleman does not trust me, I insist that he make the point of order. He can not reserve it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that when a paragraph has been read and no objection made to it, we can not get back to it except by unanimous consent, whatever the chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] might want to do with regard to the matter. I am not going to put myself in the attitude of allowing this matter to get beyond our control, because, as gentlemen understand, after a paragraph has been passed without any point of order being made, and without any reservation, it can not be recurred to except by unanimous consent. I simply desired to reserve the point of order so that it would not require the unanimous consent of 356 members to go back and raise objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to raise the point of order at the close of the paragraph?

Mr. SWANSON. I want to reserve it either at the conclusion of the reading or before, whichever may be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. It would have to be raised after the reading, if the gentleman from California insists that the gentleman from Virginia make a point of order at that time.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to reserve a point of order?

Mr. SWANSON. I do, against each of these paragraphs.

Mr. LOUD. I insist that the gentleman can not reserve the point of order. If he wants to make a point of order he can make it.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order against these paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia press his point of order at this time?

Mr. LOUD (after a pause). The gentleman from Virginia evidently does not know what he wants.

Mr. SWANSON. The paragraph just read is exactly the bill as agreed upon, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will resume the reading.

H. R. 4821. An act granting an increase of pension to Herbert A. Boomhower.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 4084. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Wickham.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 30.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental expenses, including letter boxes, furniture, satchels, straps, badges, etc., $150,000.

Mr. JETT. I wish to call attention to this item just read. Does it refer to receiving boxes?

Mr. LOUD. That means the boxes put up in the cities—the regular boxes—not the boxes that inhabitants on a rural route may provide for themselves. This paragraph does not relate to receiving boxes along the line of a rural-delivery route.

Mr. JETT. Is not that a large appropriation for that number? About how many do they usually have on a route?

Mr. LOUD. It is not all for boxes. There are incidental expenses, including the letter boxes, furniture, satchels, straps, badges, etc. Yes; I think it is a very large item.

Mr. JETT. Is it understood that these rural carriers have satchels, as they do in the cities?

Mr. LOUD. That is what I understand. They are furnished with satchels.

Mr. JETT. It is for the receiving boxes and not for the boxes along the line.

Mr. LOUD. No.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers of rural free-delivery service, $7,000,000. In all, for rural free-delivery service, $7,529,400: Provided, That hereafter all mail service on rural free-delivery mail routes shall be performed by carriers designated pursuant to an advertisement inviting competitive bidding, except as herein otherwise provided.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to line 25, on page 15, after the word "dollars."

Mr. LOUD. I desire to make a statement, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] yield?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Certainly, I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. I would state, Mr. Chairman, that it was understood when this bill was before the House that whatever action——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will suspend a moment I will state that the Chair is inclined to think that from line 22, on page 15, to line 8, on page 17, is substantially one paragraph, and that the Clerk may read, and then it will be subject to amendment or to the point of order, if it is desired to be raised.

Mr. LOUD. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. That before any person shall be designated to carry the mail on any mail rural free-delivery route, the Postmaster-General shall cause an advertisement to be posted for not less than ten days, in a conspicuous place accessible to the public, in the post-office from which the mail is to be carried, inviting proposals, in such form as he may prescribe, for the service to be performed. The service shall be awarded to the lowest bidder who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Postmaster-General that such bidder is a legal and actual resident of the district or territory in which the proposed service is to be performed; that he is a reliable and trustworthy person, of good moral character, able to read and write, and having sufficient intelligence and ability to properly perform the service, and who shall tender sufficient guaranties that he will personally perform acceptable service; but the Postmaster-General may reject all proposals submitted under any advertisement.

Second. That no additional compensation shall be allowed to a rural free-delivery carrier unless pursuant to an advertisement and award of service as herein provided.

Third. That under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, a substitute carrier may be employed, at the expense of the regular carrier, to temporarily perform the service on any rural free-delivery mail route.

Fourth. That rural free-delivery carriers heretofore appointed, and now in the service, may be continued as carriers at a rate of compensation not exceeding $600 per annum, until such time as the Postmaster-General shall advertise for proposals and make awards for the several routes on which such carriers are now employed.

Mr. LOUD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 25, page 15, all after the word "provided;" also all of page 16 and lines 1 to 8, inclusive, of page 17, and insert the following:

"That on and after July 1, 1902, the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized to classify the rural free-delivery service and fix the compensation to employees in such service as follows:

"Special agents in charge of divisions at not exceeding $2,400 per annum.

"Special agents, four classes, graded in even hundreds of dollars, at $1,300, $1,400, $1,500, and not exceeding $1,600 per annum.

"Route inspectors, four classes, graded in even hundreds of dollars, at $900, $1,000, $1,100, and not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

"Clerks, four classes, graded in even hundreds of dollars, at $900, $1,000, $1,100, and not exceeding $1,200 per annum.

"Carriers at salary not exceeding $900 per annum and no other or further allowance or salary shall be made to said carriers. But the carriers shall not be prohibited from doing an express-package business provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties.

"Under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, a substitute carrier may be employed at the expense of the regular carrier, to temporarily perform the service on any rural free-delivery mail route.

"The Postmaster-General may allow such per diem and other incidental expenses in connection with the rural free-delivery service as Congress may from time to time provide."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is the act that passed the House the other day, word for word, which I offer here in place of that which is contained in the bill. This is in accordance with the understanding that was made at the time.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I offer the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, line 25, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall cause to be prepared and distributed to those who may desire to make use of them specifications for mail boxes suitable for use on rural mail routes, and all boxes constructed according to such specifications and purchased and erected by patrons of rural routes shall be approved by the Post-Office Department without regard to the name of the person or firm which may have manufactured such boxes."

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment. Let it be considered as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. DAVIDSON. This amendment is in reference to the regulations under which boxes on rural mail routes are now procured.

Mr. LOUD. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if it is not too late. My attention was distracted at the time, as you know the attention of the chairman of the committee often is.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose, strictly speaking, the gentleman from Wisconsin would have to yield. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from California reserves the point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. This proposed amendment may possibly be subject to the point of order, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the manner in which boxes are selected for rural mail routes. Something like a year ago the officials of the Post-Office Department organized a commission, which requested manufacturers of different mail boxes to present samples for consideration. It was not understood by myself, and I do not think anyone expected, that that commission intended to select any particular box manufactured by any particular person or firm. Something like 70 samples of boxes were submitted to that commission and, much to the surprise of myself and others, the commission approved of 14 out of the 70, and since that time the Post-Office officials have insisted that upon every rural route established some one of these 14 varieties of boxes must be selected.

This regulation gives a monopoly to these 14 manufacturers of boxes. It allows 14 persons or firms to provide the boxes for all the rural mail routes in the country. I have no doubt the officials acted honestly and with the best intentions, and probably selected what they thought were the best boxes, but I believe there were other samples submitted which were just as weather-proof, made of just as good material, and in every way just as good boxes for rural mail service as some of these 14 varieties. Then, that being so, why should they be shut out from selling these boxes to patrons? I maintain that the only fair way, the only honest way, between man and man for the supplying of these boxes would be for the Department to make proper specifications, and if they desire they can provide that the box shall be weather-proof, that it shall be of certain dimensions, that it shall be made of material of certain weight, of tin or iron, whatever may be used, and then let these specifications be given to every manufacturer of tin and iron in the country who desires to manufacture rural mail boxes. The competition which would follow from the general manufacture of boxes would tend to lessen the cost, and thus benefit the patrons of rural routes who purchase them.

There are manufacturers of boxes in my district who submitted samples to that commission which were rejected. I believe their box was just as good as some of the boxes named in this list. I have examined them carefully, and that is my humble judgment. Yet those young men, who had invested a large amount of money for the purpose of manufacturing these boxes, who had orders for the delivery of boxes in Minnesota, in Wisconsin, in Indiana and Ohio, were obliged to cancel those orders and not manufacture any more, because, forsooth, their box was not one of the 14 selected out of the 70 submitted. If some manufacturer living in some section of the country can manufacture a box cheaper than any other manufacturer, he ought to have the right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Just a moment more. I do not think there can be any possible objection to the Department making proper specifications, and then permitting anyone who wants to do so to manufacture these boxes. Let any hardware merchant or tin manufacturer in a town make these boxes and sell them locally to the people who are his regular customers, and who are going to have the benefit of a rural mail route in their locality, rather than compel them to send to Indiana, or Ohio, or some other State and buy from some particular manufacturer.

Now, upon the question of a point of order, it may be that this amendment changes existing law. I do not think, however, there is any law on the subject. I think it is purely a regulation of the Department. They have undertaken to establish a commission to select some particular boxes and then say that the patrons of rural mail routes must select one of the fourteen chosen. I do not think this practice ought to continue, and therefore I should like to have my amendment voted upon. If this amendment is not in order at this time, I sincerely hope some law or regulation may be enacted so that these boxes may be manufactured by anyone desiring to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California insist on the point of order?

Mr. LOUD. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say a word or two on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order or against the amendment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am against forcing the farmers all over this country to submit to a monopoly on this question of rural mail boxes. I could not hear the reading of the resolution, but I know of this outrage, and if it strikes at that I am for the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the fair, square, just, and equitable thing in this matter. I expressed myself a few days ago by some interrogatories put to the gentleman upon my left [Mr. JOHNSON] whose speech has not been printed, and since then, by some misunderstanding, some of the friends of the rural-delivery system have quoted me incidentally as saying the farmer could furnish his own box. This has been the case in some parts of the country. The rule now seems to be otherwise. I am utterly opposed to the present system, because it forces the farmers of this country, as I am informed, to pay as much as $3.50 for a box in which the rural carrier places the mail of the farmers of this country.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that is an oppressive price. I say it is wrong. I say it is an outrage. I say it is oppression. I say that it will unpopularize this splendid rural-delivery system. The farmer himself can furnish as good a box as he needs or wants, or he can have it made in his little town or in the capital of his State, or he can have it made in a tin shop, or he can have it made in a blacksmith shop, or he can make it himself. I have made them. I know they can be made, and at a small price—much less than $3.50. Any man who has a hatchet, lumber, and some nails can do it, and it is wrong for the Postmaster-General to force, to compel, the farmers to whom we are trying to give the benefits of this splendid rural-delivery system to buy a particular box at $3.50. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] is right on this proposition, according to my understanding of his speech.

The way these monopolists get their work in is this: They hear that a rural route agent is out in a certain territory, and these manufacturers of these boxes immediately anticipate the coming of the agent. They take the box there and show it to the people who want to get the service. They tell them, "This is the kind of box you must have in order to get this service," and so they impose upon the confiding and honest farmers of this country by making them believe they have to take this box in order to get the rural-delivery service. I have the names of a couple of gentlemen who are engaged in this business. I was told this a few nights ago in one of our hotels by one of our reputable newspaper men, who said he knew the facts, and he promised to give me a written statement that certain distinguished individuals, whose names I will not call, because he did not bring me the written statement, were interested in this matter.

This newspaper man said that they and their agents anticipated the route agents and imposed upon the farmers the statement that they must take the $3.50 box in order to get the rural-delivery service. I say that is a wrong, and one Congress should crush. I hope the Department does not want this wrong to continue, and I make this statement, based on the statement of a reputable newspaper correspondent whom I have known for years and whom every member of this House knows, so the Post-Office Department may have this information in dealing with this question in the future.

Mr. JETT. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to add a word to what has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin. There appears in this bill a sum of over $7,000,000 for this service of rural free delivery of mail, and, as has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, 14 manufacturers of these rural mail boxes are permitted to furnish the boxes for the patrons wherever these routes are established. Why is it that this must necessarily be confined to 14 manufacturers only? Where we are putting these routes in throughout the United States the patrons have to send a hundred and some of them more than a hundred miles in order to get boxes before they will be recognized by the Department.

I have known in some instances where they have served notice on the patrons through the local postmaster where the route is established that if any box is put up that is not recommended—meaning not one of the 14 recommended by this Commission—they would not be recognized by the Post-Office Department and not have the protection of the Government if any violations of law were committed in relation to these boxes, or the mails deposited in there, or for the destruction of the boxes. So, then, I want to say to the members of this House, so far as the question of order is concerned, that I believe it can not be said this is a change of existing law, because there is no law upon this subject at all.

Mr. LOUD. If there is no law, while it may not be a change of law, it is new law and legislation.

Mr. JETT. If it is making a law, then we will be making a law which ought to be made, because of the fact that it would furnish to the patrons of rural mail delivery throughout the country who are exceedingly anxious to have this service an opportunity to buy boxes that would supply their needs at a reasonable price, not controlled by a combination, as is so apparent today. What is to hinder this House from passing this bill, with the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin authorizing the Department to specify the kind and character of box that should be used, and when that is done any manufacturer of the country who wants to can manufacture this box and then give it the protection of the law?

So I want to say this: I believe the people can get their boxes much cheaper in many instances if this amendment is adopted than they do under the present system. Here is a card in which the price list is set out in full of the fourteen manufacturers of these boxes. They can be provided for the patrons of this mail system at a much cheaper rate. The farmers of this country who are familiar with the present policy would be pleased to see a change in the manner of furnishing them their boxes for the rural mail service.

Mr BROMWELL. I rise to a point of order. What is the pending question? Is there a point of order on this amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman wants to know the actual parliamentary condition, the matter before the House is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California. That is the amendment really in order.

Mr. BROMWELL. Was not a point of order raised against the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin? I understood the gentleman from California to make the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I reserved the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is moving an amendment against which a point of order has been reserved, and by common consent debate has been proceeding upon that amendment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California should be considered first, and then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JETT. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin was offered as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it comes before it in order on the bill.

Mr. LOUD. I want to make one suggestion on this matter. The Post-Office Committee has considered this question of boxes. We find the Post-Office Department, or the First Assistant Postmaster-General, not in writing but verbally, recommended that they should be authorized to adopt one box and purchase it and sell it to citizens along the route. This committee can not come to any conclusion about that matter. We know the Post-Office Department have had jurisdiction in the matter of free-delivery boxes for a good many years, and we believe this is a matter of detail that must be intrusted to the Department, and that Congress can not intelligently legislate upon this question. Now, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. McCLEARY. Let us have the amendment read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Supply division: For stationery for postal service, $70,000.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, by the courtesy of the gentleman from California, the gentleman from Virginia, and the gentleman from Tennessee, I have been allowed fifteen minutes in which to address a few observations in reply to the masterly defense made by the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word, and asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I object, if the gentleman is not going to speak to the bill.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have made arrangements with the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Virginia, and they have courteously agreed——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not wish to be discourteous; but I believe each member of the House has the right to see that the rules are enforced.

Mr. BURLESON. I hope the gentleman, who knows the reason why I am driven to this course and have thrown myself upon the courtesy of the gentleman from California——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. And the reason that I do know has made me think that I ought to object. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Texas to address the committee for fifteen minutes?

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman might properly allow the gentleman from Illinois to put in any objection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am acting on my responsibility—I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BURLESON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the gentleman is allowed to do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing facing slips and cutting same, card slide labels, blanks, and books of an urgent nature for the postal service, and manifold books for the registry service, $50,000.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 2, strike out the word "registry" and insert the word "postal;" so that it will read:

"For printing facing slips and cutting same, card slide labels, blanks, and books of an urgent nature for the postal service, and manifold books for the postal service, $50,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail-messenger service, $1,083,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 18, page 19, as a new subdivision, insert:

"For transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or similar device, by purchase or otherwise, $500,000."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman desires to discuss it, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, for some years in several of the largest cities throughout the country pneumatic tubes were used for the transportation of mail under certain conditions. Some objection was made to the service on account of its expense, and Congress refused to appropriate for it after the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. An expert commission was appointed under the act of June 2, 1900, which made a searching investigation of this system. From the report of this Commission it appears that this service has been of great value, and it fully upholds the system within defined limits as an important, valuable, and necessary accessory of mail communications.

The Postmaster-General in his annual report for the present year urges that an appropriation of $500,000 be made for the renewal of this system. The business interests of the country, which have been seriously injured by the delay consequent upon the discontinuance of this service, are unanimous in their demand and requests that the service be renewed.

The pneumatic tube that was in operation between the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn, of the city of New York, was unique in its character. Through this tube was sent mail in both directions, and all the mail matter from New York to Brooklyn and from Brooklyn to New York, excepting the very large, bulky packages, were transmitted through it. The time that it took to send a pneumatic carrier from the Brooklyn post-office to the New York post-office was two and a half minutes. By wagon service it is twenty. The difference in the time of sending the mail from Brooklyn to the railroad station at Forty-second street was thirty-nine minutes. Mail matter can be sent through the tube in eleven minutes; it takes fifty minutes by car and wagon service. By having the pneumatic-tube service it was possible to close the mails in Brooklyn and down town in New York fifty-seven minutes later than without such service.

The Postmaster-General, in his report, points out the incongruity of the action of Congress in paying large sums for fast-train service only to have its object defeated by slow wagon service at the great terminal cities. More than that, the pneumatic-tube service is certain; it is never interfered with by reason of the weather. The testimony taken before this commission shows that in several instances in Boston and New York, on account of severe snowstorms, it was impossible to transmit the mails from the general post-office to the railroad stations in time for the regular trains. I understand that the committee has been giving some consideration to this matter. I had hoped that it would have reported in this bill an appropriation for the renewal of this service. While there have been some serious objections to it on account of its cost, I think it is safe to trust the Postmaster-General to make contracts that will be fair to the Government.

For one, I am willing to trust the Postmaster-General of this Administration, and I hope that the chairman of the committee, with the same confidence in a gentleman of his own political faith, will not insist upon this point of order. If it be necessary, considering the purpose for which these tubes are used, I believe it would be proper for the Government to acquire the control of them by purchase. I do not favor any extravagant price, but I do believe that if the Government were to pay a fair value for these tubes, and take them and operate them, great benefit would inure to the entire postal service.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that we have been in accord very much on the pneumatic-tube service. In the city of New York you have had practical experiment with the pneumatic tube, and since that you have been without it. I would like to ask what is the effect upon the mail service in the city of New York through the abandonment of the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is great delay, less efficient work by the clerks, and serious inconvenience to the business interests of the entire country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Now, I want to ask whether there has been any protest by the commercial interests in New York against the abandonment of the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been a protest throughout the United States against the discontinuance of this service. It affects not only the residents of the city of New York, but it affects every man in the Union who has business with the business men in cities like New York and Chicago. The more expedition that can be had in transmitting mails the more the business interests of the country are advanced. It is pointed out in the report of this expert commission that where the mail is brought to and from the distributive points through pneumatic tubes, and, instead of being dumped in great bulk from the wagons, it arrives in small bundles the clerks are able to handle the mail more efficiently, with more dispatch, and with less trouble and labor. The establishment of this service results in a decrease in the expenditures in other branches of the service. It is not necessary to expend as much for messenger service and wagons. It is possible to decrease the wagon and car service between the points connected by the tubes. The commission points out that greater efficiency can be had from a smaller force doing this work with the tube service than from a larger force handling the same amount of mail without that service.

I hope the Committee on Post-Offices will listen to the petition of the business interests of the country; and that if the chairman of the committee insists upon his point of order to this amendment, that he will speedily report a bill providing for the rental service in those cities where it was discontinued and for its extension to cities where it has been pronounced to be absolutely essential for the benefit of the service.

In a résumé—the various questions involved in this matter—the expert commission that investigated the pneumatic-tube service pointed out in detail the advantages of the system. It points out that it is "a novel, a valuable, and a mechanically successful system, ingeniously elaborated and practically adapted in an admirable manner to the purposes of the Post-Office Department." It finds the system of immense advantage to the business interests of the country in its facilitation of mail transmission, both locally and generally throughout the United States. It points out that the cost of this advance in postal methods is found to be necessarily large, but yet to be productive of more than proportional advantages in the large cities. The plants that were in operation at the time the commission reported, in its opinion, should have been retained, and recommended extensions in a limited number of cases, specifically mentioned in its report.

The commission further stated in great detail precautions which should be taken to secure this service under reasonable terms to the Government.

Much time, labor, and expense have been spent in an investigation of this detail of the postal service. Its report, thorough in every respect, was sent to the last Congress. Ample time has elapsed for careful consideration. Its recommendations should be given effect. There should be legislation renewing this service at New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Boston. It should be extended to Chicago and the other cities recommended by the expert commission. Such legislation will be of material benefit to the postal service, which will thereby be immensely improved. The great business interests of the country will be benefited. There is a public demand for this service. It comes from men who seek to subserve no selfish interests, merely the improvement of the postal service in a legitimate way. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. I do not care to speak on the point of order unless the Chair wishes to hear me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I concede that the amendment is subject to a point of order, if the gentleman from California wishes to urge it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York concedes that the amendment is subject to a point of order. Therefore the Chair rules it out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway Mail Service: One General Superintendent, at $3,500; 1 Assistant General Superintendent, at $3,000; 1 chief clerk, office of General Superintendent, at $2,000; 1 assistant chief clerk, office of General Superintendent, at $1,800; 11 division superintendents, at $2,700 each; 11 assistant division superintendents, at $1,800 each; 22 assistant superintendents, at $1,600 each; 109 chief clerks, at $1,600 each; 1,292 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 491 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 1,504 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 823 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 3,461 clerks, class 3, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 2,188 clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $900 each; 680 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I merely desire to present some facts in regard to the effect of this bill so far as the increase of salaries is concerned. The present force has been increased in every instance; that is to say, the number of employees at each salary, as now provided by law, has been increased; and in addition to that two of the classes—class 5 and class 4—have had an intermediate salary provided for—$1,300 and $1,100—and in the bill there have been a number of clerks provided for at those salaries. Without reading the details as to the number of the present force and the proposed number under this bill at each of the salaries, I will ask permission to print it in the RECORD:

Class.	Present force, salary.	Present number.	Proposed number.
5	$1,400	1,251	1,292
5	1,300	----------	491
4	1,200	1,752	1,504
4	1,100	----------	823
3	1,000	3,929	3,461
2	900	2,098	2,188
1	800	559	680

This bill keeps in the service all of the $1,400 clerks. It promotes 41 clerks from $1,200 to $1,400; 491 clerks from $1,200 to $1,300. It leaves 1,220 clerks at $1,200. It promotes 284 clerks from $1,000 to $1,200 and 823 clerks from $1,000 to $1,100. It leaves 2,822 clerks at $1,000. It promotes 639 from $900 to $1,000 and leaves 1,459 at $900. It promotes 729 clerks from $800 to $900. It provides for the appointment of 170 new clerks at $900; 510 at $800. The total promotions under this bill are 2,682 clerks receiving an increase of $100 each and 325 clerks receiving an increase of $200 each.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment, to strike out the last 4 lines of page 20 and all of page 21 down to and including line 13 and to insert the amendment which I send to the desk. I will not ask the Clerk to read it at the present time, but will briefly state what it is.

The amendment of Mr. TAWNEY was as follows:

Strike out all of lines 22 to 25, inclusive, on page 20, and lines 1 to 13, inclusive, on page 21, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That on and after the 1st day of July, 1901, employees of the Post-Office Department known as railway postal clerks shall be divided into 10 classes and be paid according to the following rates per annum: First class, not exceeding $800; second class shall receive $900; third class shall receive $1,000; fourth class shall receive $1,100; fifth class shall receive $1,200; sixth class shall receive $1,300; seventh class shall receive $1,400; eighth class shall receive $1,500; ninth class shall receive $1,600; tenth class shall receive $1,800.

"The Postmaster-General may, however, at his discretion, temporarily reduce the salary of any clerk as a penalty for delinquency or misconduct in such sum as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of discipline and efficient service; such reductions to based upon a demerit system, which shall be uniform throughout the service.

"That the original appointments to the position of railway postal clerk shall be made to class 1 for a probationary period of six months from the date of the same, less such time as the appointee may have performed service as a substitute clerk, as provided by the postal laws and regulations and the civil-service laws and regulations; and no permanent appointment shall be made before the expiration of the probationary period, and then only when the appointee shall have shown himself proficient in his duties, fully competent to perform the same, and has made a satisfactory record.

"Promotions shall be based solely upon efficiency, faithfulness, and good conduct, and the clerk must serve at least six months in each class before being promoted to a higher class: Provided, That on lines upon which full railway post-office cars have been authorized by the Postmaster-General a clerk appointed to a crew of five or more shall, after having passed the probationary period, be appointed a clerk of class 2, and if he proves himself proficient in his duties and has made a satisfactory record, he shall, within a year after receiving his permanent appointment, be promoted to class 3, and shall not be further promoted unless there is a vacancy in a higher class; but if he is appointed to a crew of 2, 3, or 4 clerks, and continues to make a satisfactory record, then he shall be advanced one grade each year until he shall have reached the maximum class of the lowest grade in the car to which he is assigned, as hereinafter provided for.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars have not been authorized by the Postmaster-General, where but 1 clerk to a car is appointed to perform the duties and who runs an average of 110 miles or more per day, he shall be of class 5.

"If the daily average of miles run is less than 110 and not less than 100, the clerk shall be of class 4; if less than 100 and not less than 90, the clerk shall be of class 3; if less than 90 and more than 80, the clerk shall be of class 2. If the average distance run is 80 miles or less the clerk shall be of class 1, and the salary shall be not less than $10 per annum for each mile of the daily average of miles run: Provided, That the clerks of these classes, assigned as above, are employed exclusively by the Post-Office Department.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars have not been authorized by the Postmaster-General, where more than 1 clerk is assigned to duty in a car, the additional clerks shall be of classes lower than the clerk in charge, except where the clerk in charge is of class 1, and in no case shall such additional clerks be of a class higher than class 4. Where helpers are assigned to duty on such lines they shall not be of a class higher than class 3.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars are run by the order of the Post-Office Department, and to which 2 clerks to a crew are assigned, there shall be 1 clerk of class 8 and 1 clerk of class 6 or lower, as hereinbefore provided for.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars are run by order of the Post-Office Department, and to which 3 clerks to a crew are assigned, there shall be 1 clerk of class 8, 1 clerk of class 6, and 1 clerk of class 5 or lower, as hereinbefore provided for.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars are run by order of the Post-Office Department, and to which 4 clerks to a crew are assigned, there shall be 1 clerk of class 8, 1 clerk of class 6, 1 clerk of class 5, and 1 clerk of class 4 or lower, as hereinbefore provided for.

"On lines upon which full railway post-office cars are run by order of the Post-Office Department, and to which 5 or more clerks to a crew are assigned, there shall be 1 clerk of class 8, 1 clerk of class 6, 1 clerk of class 5, 1 clerk of class 4, and others of class 3 or lower, as hereinbefore provided for.

"On lines where more than one distributing car is run in a train there shall be 2 additional clerks of class 6 for each additional distributing car.

"The clerk receiving the highest salary in any crew will be designated clerk in charge.

"Clerks employed on steamboat lines shall be of class 1; the salary to be determined by the amount of work to be performed and whether they are employed exclusively by the Post-Office Department.

"Clerks employed as porters in railway post-offices shall be of class 1 and shall be paid a salary not exceeding $600 per annum.

"The General Superintendent may, when necessary, detail clerks of such classes as the character of the work may indicate to duty at important railway junctions; such clerks to be designated as transfer clerks in charge and assistant transfer clerks; and it shall be their duty to look after the handling and transfer of mails at railroad depots and perform such other work pertaining to the Railway Mail Service as may be required of them. When more than one clerk is needed for such duty at the same depot the additional clerks shall be of classes below class 7, but in no case shall more than 1 clerk of the same class, above class 3, be so detailed at the same depot.

"Such clerks as may be assigned to duty in charge of one or more lines shall be of class 9 and be designated as chief clerks, and shall, when traveling on business of the Department, be paid from the appropriations for the transportation of mails on railroads their actual and necessary expenses, but not exceeding $3 per diem.

"There shall be 1 clerk detailed to duty in the office of each division superintendent, who shall be designated assistant superintendent Railway Mail Service, and who shall act as division superintendent in the absence of that officer. Such clerk shall be of class 10, and shall, when traveling on the business of the Department, be paid from the appropriation for the transportation of mails on railroads his actual and necessary expenses, but not exceeding $3 per diem.

"There may be detailed to duty in the office of the General Superintendent and of each division superintendent of the Railway Mail Service as many railway postal clerks, in the judgment of the General Superintendent, as may be necessary to transact the business of those offices properly; but there shall be but 1 clerk of class 10 detailed to duty in the office of each division superintendent.

"That all railway postal clerks whose duties require them to work six days or more per week, fifty-two weeks per year, shall be allowed an annual vacation of fifteen days with pay.

"No clerk shall receive less salary after the passage of this act than he was receiving prior thereto, and no clerk shall be reduced from a higher to a lower grade after his assignment thereto unless such salary or grade is properly reduced by reason of his inefficiency to perform the duties of such higher grade, unless temporarily reduced as a penalty for delinquency or misconduct, as hereinbefore provided for, or unless the status of the line to which he is assigned may be so changed by the reduction of mileage, withdrawal of full railway post-office cars, reduction of force or otherwise, as to bring him within a different class, as provided in this act, or unless he be transferred from one line to another at his own request or in the interest of the public service.

"SEC. 2. That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this paragraph, and that such appropriation be deemed an annual appropriation."

Mr. LOUD. I desire to reserve a point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California reserves a point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment need not be read, as it is a familiar friend to the members of the House, but not to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is known as the reclassification bill—the bill for the reclassification of the Railway Mail Service. It was first introduced in the Fifty-fourth Congress by a member of this House from Michigan, Mr. Linton; but owing to the Democratic deficiency in the public Treasury the bill was not at that time pressed for consideration.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress it was again introduced—introduced by the distinguished gentleman who now presides over this House as its Speaker. The outbreak of the Spanish war, involving the expenditure of large sums of money for the purpose of carrying on that war, made it practically impossible to increase the salaries of anyone. We then needed all the money available for carrying on the war with Spain. And the railway postal clerks realized the situation and patriotically ceased their efforts to secure the passage of their bill in that Congress. In the Fifty-sixth Congress this same measure was again introduced by myself, but never considered in the committee, and it was again introduced by me in this Congress. This amendment proposes to reclassify the Railway Mail Service and allow a small increase in the salaries of the clerks in that service.

It has had the approval of the Post-Office Department ever since 1889. It has been recommended to Congress by every Postmaster-General, except the present Postmaster-General, and it has been recommended by the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service in every annual report that has been made since 1889. That you may know the ground upon which this legislation is desired by the Department, the grounds upon which it is asked by the almost 9,000 railway postal clerks throughout the United States, I will read from the report of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, whose argument in favor of it is unanswerable:

Speaking of this proposed measure, the general superintendent says:

This subject has received more or less consideration in the annual reports made by this office since 1889. It believed then and believes now that what is contended for in the different bills that have been introduced in both Houses of Congress will not only advance the efficiency of the service and more nearly equalize the compensation and labor, but also act as fuel to quicken the faithfulness, energy, application, and inventiveness which have thus far driven the Railway Mail Service forward along the pathway of improvement even at the sacrifice of life and health.

Individual members of Congress, influential and intelligent people in commercial life, and the higher officers of the Post-Office Department have indorsed from time to time the different measures introduced in our National Legislature.

This measure, I may say, is the same bill that has been reintroduced in every Congress since the Fifty-fourth, and is the bill referred to here by the general superintendent.

The Fifty-sixth Congress, in its first session, acted favorably upon that portion of the recommendation of this office which related to those who may be regarded as part of the supervisory force of the service, and also which touched on the restoration of the maximum salaries of clerks of classes 4 and 5. The salaries of these clerks were reduced in 1876 in order to meet an emergency in the nature of a short appropriation for that year, and, although they expected every year to have their salaries restored to the old figures, it was not until June 2, 1900, that Congress saw fit to enact legislation placing their salaries back on the old basis.

The same Congress, in its second session, further recognized the value of the official corps, as shown by act of Congress of March 3, 1901; but while the beneficiaries of these provisions are exceedingly grateful for the consideration shown, it is believed that the full measure of recognition will not have been extended until those features of the proposed bill which relate particularly to increase in the salaries of what may be called the rank and file of the service have been provided for.

The records show that the labor required of the clerks at the present time, both as regards amount and quality, is vastly greater and more complicated than it was years ago, when they were receiving the same salaries as now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY continued the reading, as follows:

Taking the year 1877 and comparing it with the year under review, we find the following:

Year ending June 30, 1877.—Letters distributed, 484,909,308; pieces of other classes distributed, 379,823,619; whole number of pieces distributed, 864,732,927; number of clerks employed, 2,500; number of pieces correct to each error, 3,264.

Year ending June 30, 1901.—Letters distributed, 7,611,621,920; pieces of other classes distributed, 6,569,602,500; whole number of pieces distributed, 14,181,224,420; number of clerks employed, 8,978; number of pieces correct to each error, 10,626.

Per cent of increase in mail matter distributed, 1,539.95.

Per cent of increase in efficiency, 222.48.

Per cent of increase in force, 259.12.

This, in general terms, means that the clerk of the present day not only does nearly five times as much work as the 1877 clerk, but does it with one-third the number of errors for an equal amount handled.

There is another fact referred to here, which I will not stop to read, but one that should appeal to the sympathy as well as to the spirit of fairness and justice on the part of every member. It is the percentage of casualties and deaths that occur annually in the Railway Mail Service. During the year 1901 the death rate in the railway postal service was 3¼ per cent. Three and one-third per cent were the fatalities, death by accident, in the Railway Mail Service of last year. There is another fact alluded to in this report that is worthy of our most careful consideration, and that is the fact that about one-half of the time the majority of the railway mail clerks is spent away from home, and during these periods they are obliged to defray their own expenses out of their present small salaries. That is, they are obliged to defray this extraordinary expense while in the discharge of their duty. There is not another clerk or employee of the Government who is obliged when away from home in the discharge of his duty as a public servant to defray out of his salary his living expenses, and there should be no discrimination. These men risk their lives every day in the service. Their labor is more exacting, more arduous, and requires a higher degree of intelligence than that of any other subordinate employee of the Government, and notwithstanding the extra hazardous character of the service they are obliged while away from home to maintain their families at home and themselves away from home out of an average salary of about $1,050 a year. If you can not make the allowance as foreign governments do—and all foreign governments make allowance for this extra expense—then we should at least increase their salaries to enable them to pay this extra expense while away from home, so that they might have a little something left for themselves and their families at the end of the year. On this subject the general superintendent of the service says:

This extra expense that a postal clerk is put to on account of the peculiarity of his vocation is a feature that is recognized by foreign governments. They make him allowance to cover just such inroads into his usual stipend. In Great Britain the traveling sorters receive an allowance of from 75 cents to $1.25 per trip. In France they get from $140 to $300 per annum. In Germany they receive about one-half a cent a mile for subsistence, also an allowance of from 18 to 37 cents a day for a lay over of six hours or more. In Canada the clerks receive one-half cent a mile on day trains and 1 cent a mile on night trains, the night service lasting from 8 p. m to 8 a. m.

All these things, therefore, require consideration in connection with this increased-salary question.

Now, it may be said, Why is it that a bill having the indorsement of the Department, the indorsement of every Postmaster-General since 1889—a bill that has twice passed the United States Senate; a bill that has more merit in it, in my judgment, than any of the reclassification bills pending before this House—why is it that we are forced to attempt to put a bill of that kind on the appropriation bill, when under our rules it is subject to a point of order? Simply because the power that dominates the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads refuses even to give the matter consideration or to allow the committee to consider it. That is why I am satisfied that a majority of this committee favor this proposition and would vote to report it favorably if they had an opportunity of doing so.

At the beginning of this Congress I endeavored to secure for those interested in the passage of this bill a hearing before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I was told that the matter would receive the consideration of the committee at a future date, but I have not been able to secure that hearing. My request was that the railway mail clerks themselves be given an opportunity to be heard on this proposition, and it was not long after that request was made of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that an order was issued by the executive head of this Government forbidding any railroad postal clerk appearing before a committee for the purpose of urging legislation that involved an increase of salaries or in any other manner doing anything in his own behalf. So I say to this House that there is absolutely no way whereby this measure, favored, as I know it is, by three-fourths of the membership of this House—there is absolutely no opportunity for its receiving any consideration at all on account of the attitude of certain members of the committee before which it is now pending.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary to reply at length to the annual speech of my friend from Minnesota on this subject, for it matters not, it seems, what the Post-Office Committee may do in this matter, what we may recommend, the friends of the Railway Mail Clerks' Association of the United States do not seem to be satisfied.

Last year the committee proposed in the appropriation bill to promote the higher-grade clerks. We did not adopt their reclassification bill, for reasons that seemed good to the committee at that time and which yet hold good with the committee. This year the complaint came from the lower-grade clerks that all of the benefits given in the bill of last year were for the high-grade clerks, and the committee this year took up the lower-grades, and under this bill at least 3,000 of these lower-grade clerks will be promoted $100 apiece, and about 600 or a little over will be promoted $200 each. Now that is this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. There will be no clerks receiving these higher salaries except the number specified in the bill, will there?

Mr. GRIGGS. No, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean to say that there are 3,000 in one class who will be promoted?

Mr. GRIGGS. No; but 3,000 in all the classes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are there 3,000 in all the classes that are to be promoted?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The record does not seem to correspond with that statement.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is the statement of Mr. White to the subcommittee, who made the calculation himself in the presence of the committee. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General said to the committee that this would be satisfactory to the Post-Office Department, and that it practically accomplished a reclassification of the railway mail clerks, or that it would enable the Department so to reclassify as practically to effect everything demanded in their bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me ask the gentleman another question: Suppose it becomes necessary to employ a half dozen more men in class 5 than you have provided for, how is the Department to furnish those men, under your arbitrary classification?

Mr. GRIGGS. We give them every man they ask for in class 5, and we give them every one they ask for in all other classes.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is impossible, is it not, for them to make a correct estimate of the number of men that they will need in these classes during the year?

Mr. GRIGGS. It has not been impossible in the past.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been in the past, and it is this year. For four months the railway-mail service has required the work of men in the higher class, but having reached the maximum limit allowed, they have been obliged to throw the burden of that work on men who are in that class. They could not increase the number of men in that class, because you have fixed the number.

Mr. GRIGGS. For one, two, three, or at most six months. And men who are in the Government service, and who are so careful with their labor that they are not willing to go on in the same class for a few months before they are promoted, ought to get out of it. This is what the Post-Office Committee believe.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the Department the power to make these men perform the duties of a different class than they were employed for without giving them the compensation due to other men who are performing work in that same class?

Mr. GRIGGS. Why, my friend knows that every year the Post-Office Department comes to this House with a deficiency. If there is not enough money appropriated in this bill to carry out the purposes and plans of the Department and to pay the employees of the Department, the work does not stop. It goes on and they come here for a deficiency appropriation, and always get it.

Mr. TAWNEY. But under the proposition that you make, your logical position would be that the Post-Office Department could require these men who are working in class 3 to do the work required of men in class 4, and that the men doing that work would have to wait for a deficiency appropriation in order to get the salary paid to other men in class 4.

Mr. GRIGGS. So far as the difference in the work is concerned, there is very little difference in the work of a man in the $900 class and of a man in the $1,400 class. There may be a difference in the experience of the man. There may be a difference in ability, but there is very little difference in the work. The work is nearly the same in all of them, and the real truth is the difference in pay is what makes the difference in the classes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean to say that the grade of ability required in one class can do the work in another class?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I have debated this question as far as I desire to under the head of general debate, and I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California insists on his point of order. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not. I was heard in the last Congress on the same point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment would work a radical change in existing law, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, $142,728.75: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

This is the appropriation that is commonly known as the Southern Railroad subsidy, and for the last eight or nine years it has included an appropriation of $28,000, in addition, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for the alleged expedition of mails from the city of New York to the city of Washington. This appropriation bill omits the subsidy of the Pennsylvania Company from New York City to Washington, but appropriates $142,000 which is to be used for expedition of mails over the lines from Washington to New Orleans by way of Atlanta.

I am opposed to this appropriation because the line from Washington to New Orleans is one of the great trunk lines of the country and all the other lines of that character are performing similar service—equally as good, and many of them much better service than this line performs—for the Government for the regular statutory pay. The Post-Office Department has recommended against this appropriation. That Department has repeatedly said that it has a tendency to demoralize the general service. The Postal Commission appointed a few years ago to investigate this question recommended the discontinuance of this appropriation; and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if the time is ever to come when in the interest of the people of the United States this special appropriation is to be discontinued that time is at hand.

When the appropriation was first made the line receiving the principal benefit was in a condition of insolvency. I want to say that to-day the evolution of railroad business throughout the United States has been such that this line is paying substantial dividends. When the appropriation was first made, in 1893, the regular pay that the company received from the Government, including the subsidy, amounted to $524,000, and to-day the regular pay to this line, exclusive of this bounty, is $795,866. If the company could perform this service in 1893 for $524,000, may it not perform the same service to-day for $271,000 in addition? The situation has so adjusted itself that this grant has come to be a bonus, a subsidy, a gratuity pure and simple, and the people of the United States receive no adequate return from it.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in his statement before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, stated:

We have never taken the position in the Department that additional appropriations to any railroad system would not secure a different and better service, perhaps, but the special-facility appropriation having been withdrawn from the New York and Buffalo line, the Buffalo and Chicago line, the New York and Pittsburg line, the Pittsburg and Chicago line, the Boston and New York line, and the Springfield and New York line, we think in the evolution of things the time has come when all special facilities might safely be withdrawn and we get substantially as good service as we now enjoy, not the full extent of the service we enjoy.

In the face of this recommendation, Mr. Chairman, and in the face of the history of this appropriation, there can be no question that this special appropriation—this subsidy—may be withheld without in any degree impairing the efficiency of the railway mail carriage service between Washington and New Orleans. The effect of continuing this appropriation, as the Postmaster-General has stated, is demoralizing to the service.

If this line fails to receive the $142,000 as a bonus for running fast trains between the city of Washington and New Orleans those trains would not be taken off. The trains are demanded by the exigencies of the service; they are demanded by the present progressive condition of the railroad business of the United States. I say that if this company is to have this $142,000 as a bonus, every other railroad in the United States is entitled to a similar gratuity. Every other road in the United States performing similar service has the right to come to Congress and insist upon a similar bounty. The fear has been expressed by gentlemen who support this subsidy that if it should be withdrawn one of the fast trains between Washington and New Orleans would be taken off. There is no foundation whatever for such apprehension.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SUTHERLAND). The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, to strike out the paragraph last read.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 56.

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, including railway guides, city directories, and other books and periodicals necessary in connection with mail transportation, $1,000.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The pending bill carries an appropriation of $137,916,598.75 for the maintenance of the postal service. This is the largest amount ever carried for that purpose in the history of the Government in any one bill. There is an increase of $14,133,910 over the appropriation of the current year. Four million dollars of it goes to the rural mail service, nearly $3,000,000 to the railroads for carrying the mail, $1,000,000 for additional salaries to postmasters, nearly $3,000,000 for additional salaries to the Post-Office clerks, and over $900,000 increased pay to the railway mail clerks, and the other items are found in smaller sums in nearly every branch of the service.

The year which ended June 30, 1901, showed an excess of expenditure over receipts of $3,923,727.48, and the excess for the present fiscal year will probably be greater than that. It may be interesting to note the comparison of the expense of our postal system with that of other countries. The latest published comparison is that of 1899, when Great Britain had a surplus of $18,029,024.93; France, $13,201,713.90; Germany, $11,713,229.47; Austria, $2,769,802.45, while the United States had that year a deficiency of $6,413,885.81.

Some have argued that this condition is due to extravagance on the part of this country, and that an economical administration of our postal affairs would leave a large surplus on the postal account.

There are many things to be considered in determining this question. Our large area makes a necessity for a greater number of offices. The countries named have the following number of post-offices:

Great Britain	21,945
France	9,872
Germany	43,613
Austria	6,235
While the United States has	76,285

Having this large number of offices it takes more men and a greater and more extensive service to run them. Great Britain has a post-office for every 14½ square miles of its territory; France has a post-office for every 54.6 square miles; Germany has one for every 14.9 square miles; Austria for every 51.2 square miles, while the United States has only one office in every section of 138 square miles. There is a post-office for a population of every 833 persons in the United States, while in Great Britain the average population to an office is 1,852; in France, 3,918; in Germany, 1,438, and in Austria, 4,079.

These facts easily establish the proposition that because of the compact population and the larger number of persons obtaining mail at a given post-office, the service may be furnished at a much less sum, other things being equal. Another important element of expense is shown in the fact that notwithstanding our mails are carried farther and distributed to a much greater number of offices, each individual receives and sends a much greater number of articles of mail than in other countries.

In Great Britain the number of articles in one year is 86.5 pieces to the person; in France, 50.8, and in Austria, 38 articles. In this country, however, the number is over 106.

Another element of difference is in the method of carriage. The most expensive transportation is by railroad, and yet we use nearly six times the mileage by rail as Germany; seven times that of France, and twelve times that of Austria.

It is not my purpose to follow this comparison further; but these various objects show the necessary expenditure of much greater sums of money to secure to the people of this country the same advantages of mail facilities as are furnished in other countries.

The people are not concerned so much, I take it, to know what it costs some crowned head or foreign government to carry on its postal service as to be informed whether our own excellent system is economically administered, or whether the annual deficits may be overcome without injury to the service. It has been urged that the deficit is due to two causes—the abuse of the second-class mail matter, and the extraordinary prices paid to the railroads for their services in carrying the mail.

There seems to be no doubt of the fact that the second-class mail, or that which is carried for 1 cent per pound, is transported at a loss to the Government of over $15,000,000 annually. Every pound of such mail transported costs the Government 5 cents, so that there is a net loss of 4 cents on each pound carried. Last year there were 430,000,000 pounds of mail of this character.

The abuse of this second-class rate lies in the violation of the existing law, by sending through the mails large numbers of publications for advertising purposes which have no list of subscribers, and in sending at this rate that which should be carried at 8 cents per pound.

The Postmaster-General admits that if the law were properly interpreted and enforced these abuses should be overcome; but he further alleges that there have been innovations from time to time, and these have become precedents, until it is now practically impossible to enforce the law as it was originally intended. The present Third Assistant Postmaster-General is trying to overcome some of these evils, and has made progress in that direction, but the misfortune has been that in his attempted corrective methods he has reached many innocent little publications—semireligious, educational, or local—that have comparatively no circulation through the mails, while many of the gigantic advertising enterprises still use the mail at the 1-pound rate. The people will indorse his action, no doubt, if he will lay the ax at the root of the evil and break up these great abuses. Although he may reach too far in increasing the rates of postage of the insignificant publications, if this officer can break up the abuses complained of by changing the precedent and living up to the spirit of the law, he will deserve the plaudits of the American people.

The second alleged abuse—the extraordinary amount paid to railroads for carrying mails—is a question of difficult solution. This House remembers well the work of the Commission sent out by it to investigate the question of what is the reasonable compensation for transporting the mails by railroad, as well as the unsatisfactory report and divergence of opinion thereon, which left this body in a worse quandary than before the investigation was made.

One feature of this bill, which has entered into every appropriation of this character for years, it seems to me should be omitted—that is, the item which adds $142,728.75 to the already exorbitant compensation to the railroads for carrying the mail from Washington to New Orleans; a direct subsidy, it would seem, granted because Congress has the arbitrary power to do so, and for the reason that the railroads ask it. What is needed, it seems to me, is greater caution and economy. If the Department is guarded in its expenditures at every point, I have no doubt that with a rigid enforcement of the law there may be a surplus on the postal account each year.

I desire to take this opportunity of calling attention to another important part of the service, known as the "rural mails." There is no branch of the Postal Department that is so important to the rural population as that which brings the farmer in direct touch with the outside world. No part of the Government service does more to make cheerful homes and remove the isolation of country life than the rural mail service. The first appropriation of $10,000, to make experiment of this system, was made in 1894, and as a result of the experiment has come the extension of this service and the enlargement of its operations until the current year expenditure will reach the enormous sum of $3,500,000. With one exception, every State in the Union has experimental routes, and every mail brings to the Congressman who has a country constituency earnest appeals for its further extension.

There had been established on February 1, 7,094 rural routes, and there were 7,955 applications then pending for consideration. Of these routes, 350 had been established in Missouri, but there were pending 473 applications which had not been inspected. There are 28 routes located in the first Missouri district. It will be observed that there are more applications pending than there are routes established. Farmers are clamoring for the service, and in many instances can not understand the delay in obtaining it. They charge the member of Congress or the Post-Office Department of willful neglect of their petitions in some cases.

I am not one of those who complain of the action of those who control this service. It seems to me that it has been unusually efficient. There has been some partisanship in the past and may be some yet, but I am sure that the Department realizes that it has erred whenever it has for the time allowed itself to be governed by motives of political advantage rather than public service. I have no doubt that it is in good faith endeavoring to get above and beyond such sordid purposes and to place this great branch of postal labor on the highest possible plane.

Some reflections have been made on this floor against one H. Conquest Clarke, who is chief of one of the divisions of the service. He may be a newspaper writer as alleged, but it must not be forgotten that very much original matter is required in the development of the service, in the instructions that are sent out, and the rulings that are made from time to time. If this work devolves upon him, in addition to that of supervising the work of thirty or forty employees under his immediate charge, he has a place of the greatest importance.

In hearings before the Post-Office Committee of the House, Mr. Machen, the superintendent of the rural mail service, entered into the following colloquy with the chairman of that committee concerning Mr. Clarke:

Mr. MACHEN. Clarke looks after the establishment of the service; gives his attention to that matter, and is of great assistance to us.
The CHAIRMAN. You regard him as a valuable man, do you?
Mr. MACHEN. I consider him a very valuable man in many ways.
The CHAIRMAN. In a clerical way?
Mr. MACHEN. No; not in a clerical way. I would say that his forte is not in clerical duties. Mr. Clarke's forte is in considering matters that come up for which we have no precedent—writing rulings, decisions, and reports, at which he is very apt.

If Mr. Machen does not overestimate his worth, he is invaluable to this mail service.

There is one serious objection that is urged against the rural service—that is, that it injures the village and cross-road post-offices, by either discontinuing the offices there or practically taking their post-office business from them. In other words, it builds up the salaries of the postmasters in larger towns and encourages business there, but takes from the village postmaster the little compensation he receives from the Government, and otherwise injures his business by encouraging his former post-office patrons to trade where their mail is sent.

This is an objection which I would like to see overcome, but I do not know how it can be done. It will not do to say to the farmer he can not receive his mail at home because incidental benefit is shifted from the smaller to the greater town; but I believe the Department should adjust itself to these conditions, so as to do the least possible injury to the village inhabitant.

There is another class who sometimes object to it—the star-route carriers. But to me this is not a serious objection, for they are displaced by rural carriers who receive greater compensation than they do.

I am in no sense in sympathy, however, with the abuse of the star-route carrier which has been engaged in on this floor. I believe there are no more faithful servants of the people in any branch of the Government than the 23,000 carriers of the mail by private conveyance.

It is easy to make light of the blind mule and the ramshackle conveyance, but the star-route carrier, poor and unfortunate as he usually is, is honest and trustworthy, and does that which can not always be said of better paid Government officials, renders the best service he can. In my judgment he deserves the commendation of the people of the country.

I have been surprised at those who have counted his imperfections, pointed out his shortcomings, and bemoaned his incapacity, that they have not suggested something to alleviate his condition and to bring him out of the slough of inefficiency and place him on the firm rock of competency, so that they would not have occasion to cavil at his misfortunes or smile in derision at his environment.

The star-route carrier receives on an average 3⅝ cents per mile for each mile traveled in carrying the mail, while the railroads receive 10⅛ cents per mile for a similar service. The rural carriers thus far have received for their services 6⅔ cents per mile—nearly twice as much as the star-route carriers, and yet their salaries are increased by this bill 20 per cent. But nothing is said by anyone in the interest of the country carriers, who are over thirty thousand strong, except to belittle their misfortunes and complain because they can not afford to keep new conveyances or to have fat, sleek horses at all times.

I am interested in the extension of the rural service. The farmer class, so neglected in legislation, is the beneficiary. It brings these people in direct touch with the world. With a telephone in the house and his mail delivered at the gate, the farmer can keep up with all current events and can know what is happening elsewhere. He is not dependent then on information he may obtain once a week by going to town and gathering the news; but around his own hearthstone, with his family about him, he informs himself, and enjoys the associations which may mean much for the culture, morals, and happiness of the family, for their home may become the center of attraction for each member of it, rather than the little town elsewhere, which so often serves to estrange and degrade some of the brightest and most promising of the household.

The extension of the rural service is indirectly objected to on the ground of its cost to the Government; but experience has shown that but little extra cost accrues. The report of the Postmaster-General exhibits an astonishing increase of business on the rural routes, and he states as his candid judgment that the service will soon be self-sustaining. It is a matter of history that the objection first urged against city delivery was that it would impose upon the Government a burden too great for it to bear; but to-day, after forty years of experiment, it has become the great revenue-producing branch of the service.

So it may be with the rural delivery. Whether it is or not, there can be no question that with slight expense this service can be carried to the rural classes, and I believe its progress should be heralded as one of the greatest boons of the age.

The historian, Greene, author of the History of the English People, was asked, "What was the greatest achievement of the nineteenth century?" He did not answer, as most men would, referring to the commerce, manufacture, and education of the country, but replied in these simple words: "Cheap photographs." Because, he said, they had brought to every house, office, and shop the tokens of love and affection, and placed on the walls, tables, and desks thereof the pictures of their loved ones, and had kindled from day to day the beautiful fires which should burn on the altars of memory.

So this delivery service comes to the farmer at the beginning of the twentieth century as the "cheap photograph," to make more loved, prosperous, and happy the home life of the rural population.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to read a little clipping from a newspaper touching upon the free rural delivery boxes that has been laid on my desk since I went down to lunch. It reads as follows:

Mail Box and Rural Delivery (W. A.).

DEAR SIR: There is a rural delivery route by our door, but the carrier says he won't leave our Inquirer or our mail in an ordinary wooden box; he says we are compelled to pay $2 for a mail box. We write and ask you if he can compel us to buy one.

The reply to this is as follows:

We are officially informed that all you have to do is to give notice in writing to the mail carrier that you desire all your mail matter to be placed in your box or in the trunk of a tree, or in the gutter, if you so choose; and if he does not do as you request him to report the matter to Superintendent James O'Sullivan at the post-office in this city, and your friend will be taught his duty in double-quick time.

This is a clipping from the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a great conflict as to this matter of rural-delivery boxes. If this statement is true, then a farmer can have a trunk in the tree, a hole in the ground, or a tin box or anything in which to receive his mail. We have been told time and again by those who profess to know that the farmers are required to buy a certain kind of metallic box that is patented; and you must take one of 14 kinds of boxes before you can receive this rural free-delivery service. Now, with the purpose of finding out what the law on the subject is, I am going to ask the learned, distinguished, and patient chairman of this committee what the law is as to the question of furnishing the boxes to the farmers along these mail routes.

Mr. LOUD. There is no law governing the subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not there a rule?

Mr. LOUD. I believe the Department has adopted regulations which require that the patrons shall select one of the number of boxes that have been selected by the commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then the answer to this inquiry is wrong. They say that all you have to do is to give notice in writing to the mail carrier that you desire your mail matter placed in your box, or in the trunk of a tree, or a hole in the ground.

Mr. LOUD. I would not say about that.

Mr. LAMB. As I understand, there are three or four different boxes designated by the Department from which the patron can make the selection.

Mr. LOUD. There are 14 adopted by the Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have found the regulation on this point, and I want to place by the side of my remarks the rule of the Department applying to this subject, which is found on page 123 of the annual report of the Postmaster-General of the Post-Office Department. It is as follows:

On the 28th of March the report of the Commission (including the list of approved boxes submitted) received the formal approval of the Postmaster-General, and has since been promulgated with the following instructions:

"Before service will be established it will be necessary for the patrons to make selection from this list of approved boxes and to agree to equip the route with them. While the Department desires, it does not require, that the boxes on each route shall be of uniform construction. The prices of these boxes range from $1 up to a little over $3, including locks. When a rural free-delivery route has been equipped with boxes of the above-named description, the Department will consider these boxes as falling under the protection of section 5406 of the United States Revised Statutes, which provides severe penalties for any person who shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail matter deposited in any letter box, pillar box, or other receptacle established by authority of the Postmaster-General."

The law officers of the United States have accepted this construction of the United States Revised States, and in several recent instances have secured the indictment, in the United States courts, of persons guilty of destroying, defacing, or tampering with the approved rural-delivery boxes established by authority of the Postmaster-General.

This regulation shows these boxes must be bought. The farmer can not make his own box. He must, he is forced to, buy or do without the service, and he must pay from $1 "to a little over $3" for each box, "including locks." This rule takes away from the farmer his own right to have a certain kind of a mail box—his own box, a private box. This is cramping his personal rights mighty far, if not too far.

The Clerk proceeded with and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11354) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and had directed him to report the same back with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, they will be submitted to the House in gross.

The amendments were submitted in gross, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EDWARD KERSHNER.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President is hereby requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 5224) providing for the relief of Edward Kershner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the object of having the bill returned?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. For the gentleman's information I will say that the bill was passed through the House two or three weeks ago providing for the relief of Edward Kershner. It went to the Senate, passed the Senate, and was forwarded to the President for consideration. In that bill the President was authorized to appoint Edward Kershner to the Navy as a medical director. It has been discovered that objection was made to the approval of the bill because of the rank he would receive when appointed. When dismissed from the Navy he was a medical inspector, a grade lower than medical director, and therefore the Committee on Naval Affairs has asked for the introduction of this resolution, so that the bill may be recalled from the consideration of the President.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How long has the bill been in the hands of the President?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. To the best of my information a week or eight days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

REPRINT OF AN ACT.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of Public Document 162 of the Fifty-fifth Congress, known as the "Curtis Act," relating to the conditions in the Indian Territory. It is a document that we need to use very often in the Indian Committee, and the supply has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for the reprint of House Document 162, known as the "Curtis Act." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISPOSITION OF PATENT SPECIFICATIONS, WESTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 103, relative to the disposition of patent specifications and drawings in the western district of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the set of United States patent specifications and drawings now on deposit in the clerk's office of the United States district court for the western district of Pennsylvania, pursuant to section 490, Revised Statutes, be removed therefrom and deposited in the patent department of the Carnegie Library, in the city of Pittsburg, Pa., subject to the uses specified in sections 490 and 894 Revised Statutes; and that hereafter the said patent department of the said Carnegie Library of Pittsburg shall be the place of deposit for the United States patent specifications and drawings referred to in section 490, Revised Statutes, instead of the clerk's office of the United States district court for the western district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to have the gentleman make some explanation about this matter.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, under a section of the Revised Statutes the patent specifications are directed to be deposited in the clerk's office of the various Federal courts throughout the country. They have so grown that there is no room for them in the clerk's office in the western district of Pennsylvania, in Pittsburg, and the judges of the circuit and district courts and members of the bar have asked for the passage of this resolution, so that those that are now there may be transferred, and those that are to be deposited hereafter shall be transferred, into a room specially fitted up for the purpose in the Carnegie Institute. The Commissioner of Patents has approved of the resolution.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE, OYSTER BAYOU, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3312) for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, a light-house, at a cost not to exceed $5,000.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill corresponding in its provisions with this Senate bill will lie on the table. [A pause.] Has the House committee reported this bill favorably?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No, sir; the House committee has reported the bill introduced into the House.

The SPEAKER. But the Senate bill does not appear to be here.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senate bill has been referred to the committee. I have not the original bill; I have merely a copy of the Senate bill. The two bills are exactly the same.

The SPEAKER. In view of the situation of the bill, the action just taken by the House was out of order. The Chair was not advised of the circumstances. The committee must be discharged from the consideration of the bill before it can come up in the House. If there be no objection, the action just taken with reference to this bill will be vacated. The question would now be on the discharge of the committee.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The trouble, however, is that the Senate bill is not in the possession of the Clerk. There is no evidence here that it has been reported back.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The Senate bill has not been reported back; it is in the committee room now; but it is identical with the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to bring up this question again at an early opportunity.

SIGNING OF LETTERS PATENT.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12095) to amend section 4883 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the signing of letters patent for inventions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4883 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4883. All patents shall be issued in the name of the United States of America, under the seal of the Patent Office, and shall be signed by the Commissioner of Patents, and they shall be recorded, together with the specifications, in the Patent Office in books to be kept for that purpose."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not definitely understand what the bill does. It seems to make a radical change in the law with reference to patents. I should be glad to hear some explanation of it before consent is given.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, this bill changes a section of the Revised Statutes and authorizes a patent to issue signed only by the Commissioner of Patents under the seal of his office, instead of being signed by the Secretary of the Interior and countersigned by the Commissioner of Patents under the seal of his office. This amendment of the law is requested by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents as a mere matter of convenience in the business of the Patent Office, there being, as the Commissioner states, about 500 of these patents to be signed each week. The bill has been considered by the committee and unanimously reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand, this bill contemplates that both officers shall sign these documents, but reverses the order in which they do so.

Mr. REEVES. No; the object is simply to avoid the necessity of the Secretary of the Interior signing them at all—to let them be signed by the Commissioner of Patents alone, under the seal of his office.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, it dispenses with the signature of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. REEVES. That is the object entirely—to relieve the Secretary of the Interior of the mere clerical work of signing about 500 of these patents every week. The Secretary of the Interior exercises no discretion in regard to their issue; they are issued in accordance with the determination of the Commissioner of Patents and are signed by the Secretary of the Interior and countersigned by the Commissioner of Patents. The Secretary of the Interior wishes to be relieved of this duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the Committee on Patents considered this matter and recommended the adoption of this measure?

Mr. REEVES. Unanimously.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What will be the effect of this measure in regard to the authentication of patents in the courts of justice? Does it change the effect of the present provisions of law in that regard?

Mr. REEVES. Not at all. It merely allows these documents to be signed by the Commissioner of Patents under his seal instead of being first signed by the Secretary of the Interior and then countersigned by the Commissioner. This legislation is requested by the Department.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. REEVES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OUACHITA RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimons consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3261) authorizing the Eldorado and Bastrop Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Ouachita River, in the State of Arkansas.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE, OYSTER BAYOU, LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that Senate bill 3312, for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Oyster Bayou, near the Louisiana coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, called up by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], has been found and is in possession of the House. Without objection, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will be discharged and the bill will be put upon its passage, unanimous consent having been already given. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROUSSARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The similar House bill (H. R. 10077) was ordered to lie on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE KEEPER'S DWELLING AT CALUMET HARBOR.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Senate amendments be disagreed to by the House, and that the House ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Messrs. HEPBURN, MANN, and DAVIS.

EMANUEL KLAUSER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3762) for the relief of Emanuel Klaser, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM T. PRATT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3297) to correct the military record of William T. Pratt, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read, and agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH of Illinois, for four days, on account of important business.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called.

FALSE BRANDING OF FOOD AND DAIRY PRODUCTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to call up the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territory in which they are made or produced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person or persons in any State or Territory of the United States or in the District of Columbia shall falsely brand or label any dairy or food products which become articles of foreign or interstate commerce or commerce with Indian tribes as to the State or Territory in which they are made, produced, or grown, or cause or procure the same to be done by another or others.

SEC. 2. That if any person or persons violate the provisions of this act, either in person or through another, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $2,000; and that the jurisdiction for the prosecution of said misdemeanor shall be within the district of the United States court in which it is committed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the point of order that this bill can not properly be considered in the morning hour. From my understanding of the reading of it, it seems to me that it involves some expense on the Treasury. I think it is improperly on the House Calendar. If I understand it, it causes a tax upon the Government, and if that is true it can not be in order in this hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. It involves no expenditure of any kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is, of course, almost impossible to get the full purport and tenor of a bill from simply hearing it read from the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman will scrutinize the bill he will see that his point of order will not lie against it. It seems to provide for no revenue and no expenditure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It provides a punishment. It declares a certain act a misdemeanor and provides a fine.

The SPEAKER. That would apply to almost all bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and they are not subject to the point.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If that is the opinion of the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken. Does the gentleman desire to make any remarks?

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless some gentleman desires some information in regard to it, I do not care to say anything.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to answer any question.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand the gentleman, this proposes to make it a crime in any part of the United States, no matter whether the act is done within the domain of a State or within a Territory over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction. In other words, if the acts which are defined to be crimes are done in the State of New York or in the State of Georgia jurisdiction is given to the United States court.

Mr. SHERMAN. For that district.

Mr. BARTLETT. For that district.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the district in which the act is committed.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, the acts denominated crimes are not confined to places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. This is an interstate-commerce law. It provides that we can not, in one State, falsely brand an article which shall enter into interstate commerce with any other State or Territory.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is confined to dairy or food products. No other kind of merchandise seems to be reached by this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the only purpose of this act, to relate simply to dairy and food products.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman frankly state what is the purpose of this bill? I know he will do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly will, Mr. Speaker. The bill is simple in terms, as it seems to me.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will add to my request that the gentleman not only state the purport of the bill, but that he also state what gave rise to its introduction.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I was about to state. What gave rise to the introduction of this bill was a condition of affairs that has grown up in the dairy and food product trade, largely in reference to cheese. For instance, in New York and Wisconsin cheese is manufactured that the world considers of a very high class. We in New York provide that each factory shall have its number, so that we will say cheese factory No. 6 of New York puts a brand, which is peculiarly the property of that particular factory, on its cheese, and it can not be used by any other factory under our State laws. They have built up a reputation for a product; and we have, for instance, in cities a thousand miles away, in other States, a cheese, perhaps a filled cheese, perhaps it may be a cream cheese, but of an inferior quality. The merchants have in certain warehouses ten, fifty, or perhaps a hundred brands, so that if you go into a warehouse in Baltimore or in Chicago, or some other city, and desire to purchase a cheese of "factory No. 6, of the State of New York," why, the merchant says, "Certainly, I will furnish you that;" and he goes through his warehouse, takes down a brand of this factory No. 6, slaps it upon that cheese, and sells it to you.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Will your bill cover the question of counterfeiting sirup?

Mr. SHERMAN. It covers maple sirup as well, and it was upon investigation of imitations of maple sirup as well as cheese that led to the introduction of this bill and leads us to urge its passage now. It is to prevent people in other States or Territories from taking old brown sugar and melting it up and fixing it up for something in imitation of Vermont maple sirup—the highest grade of sirup—and imposing it upon the people as Vermont maple sirup, when it is not. The simple purpose of the bill is to make every commodity of a food character to go out for exactly what it is, to make it appear that it was made where it was made, and not at some other place. In other words, to prevent fraud, Mr. Speaker. That is the sole object of the bill, and it is very simple in its terms, it seems to me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think as the gentleman goes along with his explanation he will about induce me to vote for a bill I thought was a bad one. That is the reason I wanted him to explain it to me. I see in the report that the complaint originated probably from the fact that there were two articles that have been counterfeited mainly, the articles of cheese and Vermont maple sirup. From the report that I hold in my hand I find that this false branding has been practiced principally on cheese and maple sirup:

In almost any store in any of the large cities may be found packages labeled "Vermont maple sirup," which was never produced in Vermont, and some of which is entirely artificial, yet which is sold at the highest price because of the label which it carries.

Now, at first I will state to the gentleman frankly that I thought the bill was bad, but after hearing his statement, so far as I am concerned, he has almost persuaded me to vote for it.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does your bill go far enough to prevent this counterfeit branding of sirup? Why, in my country we make a great deal of pure cane sirup, and there is a great deal of sirup sold which is not the pure stuff.

Mr. SHERMAN. This will prevent the putting on the market of adulterated products with the brand upon it of pure products.

Mr. MADDOX. We have a pure cane sirup in Georgia, and we find that they are undertaking to counterfeit that article, which they do every day, by making it of cornstarch and anything else. Now, the question I desire to ask is, Will your bill cover that, too?

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me perfectly clear what the bill does cover. It prevents the selling of any food or dairy product under the claim that it was made in any particular locality where it was not made, so that, for instance, my friend from Maine here, who lives in a State that produces a brand of sweet corn that is, perhaps, the best that is made in the world, is protected. I am somewhat familiar with that trade, and I know that there are factories in New York State, and other parts of the country, that have the labels made and use them to a very great extent for their corn, marking them "Maine sweet corn," the brand used by the factory up in my friend's town (I have forgotten its name), and in that way they deceive the public and extort a price for that corn which it reasonably is not worth, because Maine corn is superior to other corn, and the merchants are simply deceiving the public into taking an inferior article for the superior product.

Mr. MADDOX. I wanted to know if it covered the whole subject.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman from New York have any objection to enlarging the scope of the bill by making it apply to any manufactured article, so as not to confine it to dairy products? For instance, in line 5, after the word "products," would you have any objection to inserting the words "or any other articles of manufacture?" Now, I will state to the gentleman that my question is based on this: One of the cotton mills down at my home city has gotten up a very fine reputation on the character of cotton goods which it manufactures. It puts a stamp on them, and they go into the market, and other manufacturers, not in that town and not in that State, have placed goods upon the market with this identical stamp on them. I should like to broaden out this bill. I see no objection to it at all, and I am willing to vote for it as it stands; but it seemed to me if we are going to protect the dairy products in this way, we might afford some protection to any other manufactured article; and if the gentleman sees no objection to it, I would like an opportunity to put an amendment of that kind on.

Mr. SHERMAN. My only objection to the gentleman's amendment is that it will complicate this matter. I believe if it stands simply and purely by itself it will meet the approval of everybody in the House; but if you go to adding an amendment, adding other products, trying to make a pure-food bill of it, you will change its scope so that it may create some opposition here. I believe the bill is a good one, an excellent one as far as it goes, and I believe it can pass substantially without any opposition, and therefore, and for that reason alone, I trust the gentleman will not insist upon amending it now.

Mr. FLEMING. I do not desire at all to impede or interfere with the passage of the bill, but I would like to see it made broad enough to cover the matter I have referred to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will join the gentleman in an attempt to pass a measure such as the one to which he refers.

Mr. FLEMING. I will offer the amendment pro forma, and let it be voted down, unless the gentleman objects to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I very much prefer that the gentleman should not offer it. I would like to pass it just as it is.

Mr. FLEMING. Then I will not offer it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to call up House bill 9059, and ask that it may be passed over at this call without prejudice or losing its place on the next call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be passed for the present without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees; when the Committee on the Public Lands was reached—

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 8593) to reduce the number of land offices in Alaska, simply to have it laid on the table. This bill has already been enacted into law as an amendment to the urgent deficiency bill; consequently it might as well be disposed of here, and I move that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PARK IN OREGON.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4393) reserving from the public lands in the State of Oregon, as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States, and for the protection and preservation of the game, fish, timber, and all other natural objects therein, a tract of land herein described, etc.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that bill can not be considered in this hour. It dedicates public property to park purposes.

Mr. LACEY. The bill is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is clearly not properly on the House Calendar; that has been repeatedly decided, and the bill will be changed to the Union Calendar. Is there any further bill from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. LACEY. Not unless the Chair will recognize me to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees, and when the Committee on the Territories was reached—

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Territories, I call up the bill (H. R. 9334) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, etc.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved July 30, 1886, entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws of the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes," is hereby amended so as to authorize the issuance of bonds by school districts in Oklahoma Territory having a bona fide population of not less than 5,000 persons for erecting necessary school buildings and purchasing the ground for the same. The limitations of said act of July 30, 1886, shall not apply to such school districts: Provided, That before any bonds shall be issued the mayor and common council of the municipal corporation, composing in whole or in part such school district, shall cause an election to be held in such district, and said mayor and common council shall cause to be published in a newspaper of general circulation, published in said district, a notice of the time and place or places of holding such election.

Such notice shall be given at least thirty days before such election. On the question of the issuance of said bonds no person shall be qualified to vote except he be in all respects a qualified elector and owner of real or personal property subject to taxation within the school district. In case two-thirds of the qualified voters, as above described, shall vote affirmatively for the issuance of said bonds, then the mayor and common council shall certify the result to the board of education, and said board shall issue the same, and not otherwise. Said bonds shall contain all necessary provisions as to form, and such school district shall provide a proper sinking fund for the redemption of said bonds. Said bonds shall not bear a rate of interest exceeding 4 per cent, and the interest shall be paid semiannually, and none of said bonds shall be sold at less than their par value: Provided further, That no school district under this act shall issue bonds in excess of 6 per cent of the valuation according to the last preceding assessment of the school district issuing the same.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Territories to call up the bill (H. R. 8736) ratifying the act of the Territorial legislature of Arizona, approved March 2, 1901, providing a fund for the erection of additional buildings for the University of Arizona.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the Territorial legislature of the Territory of Arizona entitled "An act to provide a fund for the erection of additional buildings and furnishing the same for the University of Arizona," approved March 2, 1901, and which said act was to take effect on its approval and ratification by the Congress of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, approved and ratified.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAJO COUNTY, ARIZ.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Territories, I call up the bill (H. R. 7034) for the relief of Navajo County, Ariz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Navajo, Territory of Arizona, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, through its board of supervisors, to refund the outstanding county indebtedness of said county, which said indebtedness is evidenced by bonds of said county, Nos. 30 and 73, inclusive, payable to Apache County, Ariz. Said bonds are in the sum of $1,000 each, interest payable annually on the 2d day of January, at the rate of 6½ per cent, together with $10,000 of the principal each year.

SEC. 2. That the said board of supervisors is hereby authorized to refund said bonded indebtedness, in the sum of $43,000, by issuing in lieu thereof bonds in the sum of $1,000 each, said bonds to bear a rate of interest not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, interest and $5,000 of the principal payable annually from and after the 2d day of January, 1911.

SEC. 3. That said refunding bonds shall be signed and delivered by the chairman of the board of supervisors and the treasurer of said Navajo County, and shall be made payable to the person, persons, or company purchasing the aforesaid refunding bonds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not find this bill on the House Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bill has been reported. It must have been referred to the House Calendar, for it is a House Calendar bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Private Calendar, and is not in order at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it is on the Private Calendar, it is incorrectly there; and the Chair ruled a while ago that when a bill has been incorrectly placed upon the Private Calendar it loses no rights because it is so placed. This is a bill providing for the refunding of the debt of a county at a lower rate of interest. It certainly should not be on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER (after examining the bill). The Chair is of opinion that this is in the nature of relief for individuals. The very last paragraph of the bill provides——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Chair hear me on this question, unless the mind of the Chair is fully made up? I do not want to consume time unnecessarily.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very clear in the inclination of his mind, but would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This bill provides for nothing in the world except the refunding of the debt of a county at a cheaper rate of interest. The bill can not properly be on the Private Calendar, for no private individual is interested in it.

The SPEAKER. Permit the Chair to call the gentleman's attention to a provision of the last section:

That said refunding bonds shall be signed and delivered by the chairman of the board of supervisors and the treasurer of said Navajo County, and shall be made payable to the persons or company purchasing the aforesaid refunding bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bonds could not be sold unless the purchasers were to get title by a transfer of the bonds. It is not known in advance to whom the bonds are to be sold. A public sale is provided for, and whoever purchases them, the board of supervisors is to make out a bond in his name. Such a provision does not make the bill a private bill.

The SPEAKER. These parties, then, are not creditors, but purchasers?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Purchasers to whom the board will pass the title of the bonds when issued.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has some doubt on the question, but will allow the bill to be considered during this order, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARTLETT moved to reconsider the votes by which the two bills last considered were passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be recurred to. I did not know that our committee was to be called. I came in just as it was reached and did not understand what was going on. I wish to call up a Senate bill which will excite no discussion, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to the call of the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. For what purpose?

Mr. RAY of New York. To consider Senate bill 3267.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. It is simply a bill changing the boundaries of judicial districts in the Indian Territory.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 3267) to change the boundaries between the southern and central judicial districts of the Indian Territory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all that portion of the Chickasaw Nation east of the Washita River, from the mouth of said river to the mouth of Butcherpen Creek, and north up said Butcherpen Creek to the township line between townships 4 and 5 south, in range 7 east, thence along said township line to the boundary line between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in range 8 east, shall be added to the central judicial district of the Indian Territory.

SEC. 2. That the United States court for the central judicial district of the Indian Territory shall have jurisdiction over all cases, civil and criminal, arising within the said described boundaries after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the judge of the United States court in the Indian Territory presiding in the central judicial district thereof is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint an additional United States commissioner within said district, who shall be permanently located at Durant, in the Choctaw Nation, and to prescribe by metes and bounds the portion of the district for which such commissioner is appointed.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was read, as follows:

Strike out section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That all that portion of the Chickasaw Nation east of the Washita River, from the junction of Island Bayou and the Red River, up the Red River to the mouth of the Washita River, and up said river to the mouth of Butcherpen Creek, and north of said Butcherpen Creek to the township line between townships 4 and 5 south, in range 7 east, thence along said township line to the boundary line between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in range 8 east, shall be added to the central judicial district of the Indian Territory."

Mr. RAY of New York. This amendment is in accordance with the recommendation of the Attorney-General, the object being to make the boundary more definite and certain and in accordance with the actual condition of things. The bill has already passed the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARTERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return, under the call of committees, to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and to call up a bill that was overlooked. It was not understood, in the absence for sickness of one of our members, that the report had been written. It has been written and is on the Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that we return to that bill.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to inquire the title of the bill.

Mr. CAPRON. It is bill S. 176, to provide for the extension of charters of national banks, simply. There is nothing else in it except that one necessary provision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to return to the call of the Committee on Banking and Currency for the purpose of calling up the bill (S. 176) to provide for the extension of charters of national banks. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects, and the Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the call of committees.

HAWAII DITCH COMPANY, LIMITED.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bill (H. R. 11997) granting to the Hawaii Ditch Company, Limited, the right of way over public lands in the districts of North and South Kohala in the island of Hawaii, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining ditches or canals and the necessary reservoirs, dams, and the like, for irrigation and domestic purposes in said districts.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bill H. R. 11997, with Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that general debate is not yet concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not; but the Chair recognizes the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know, but not on the amendments. I understood the Chair to say that the question was on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We would like to have an explanation of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] is recognized.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I will state very briefly about the bill. There is organized, under authority of the legislature of Hawaii, a ditch company. That ditch company has leased and purchased certain water rights where the water is now falling into the sea. It desires to convey that water to other lands and to irrigate them. In order to do that they must cross certain land the title of which is in the United States. The Secretary of the Interior, after a careful examination of the statutes, decided that he could not grant them authority or right to cross this land, and that they must get it from Congress.

The committee are very generally of the opinion that he had that authority. I will say that the committee are unanimous in this report. Now, there is a general statute which is referred to here, and which I can read, which authorizes all ditch companies, where they desire to irrigate land, to cross Government lands in other Territories. We have given them the same right of crossing this land of the Government which every ditch company has in every other Territory in the United States, in the Territory of New Mexico and Arizona or Alaska, it having been decided that that general act does not apply to Hawaii. They ask no exclusive rights. We have also placed one other burden upon them, that in addition to complying with all the provisions and stipulations of the general act which applies to all ditch companies in this country they shall furnish to any homesteader, or any other person desiring to use this water that shall purchase Government land, the water at a fair price, and if the person desiring to use it and the ditch companies can not agree as to what is a fair price, then the bill provides that it shall be determined by the district court of the United States, as you will see in the last clause.

The only variation that there is in the bill from the general act is this: As they have to file plans with the Secretary of the Interior, and as he has to send somebody, after they have filed the plans, to look it all over and approve the location before they can commence work, and as it will take near one year to do this, and as they can only use this right after he has approved their location and plan, we have, at their earnest request, allowed an extension of one year more before they forfeit their rights. Hence you will see an exception, as provided in the last section, and that section gives them six years before they forfeit it, instead of five as under the general law.

The reason for so doing, as I have stated, is that it will take so long a time to make the surveys, to forward them to the Secretary of the Interior, and then have him send competent persons there, as I understand he does, and get the reports and approve, so that they will have in reality no longer time to complete the work in than any other companies have in this country, on account of the great distance they are away from here. This bill simply grants this right to this ditch company to cross under all the restrictions and limitations of the general law the Government land in a portion of Hawaii. That is all there is to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if the restrictions and provisions of this bill are so limited that the future purchasers of Government lands will be protected in their rights to the use of the water?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. An addendum to what there is in the general law I drew myself, and it is included in this bill, and I will read it:

SEC. 2. That this right of way through the public lands is granted subject to all the conditions and requirements of the act of March 3, 1901, chapter 561, sections 18 to 21, inclusive, so far as the same shall be applicable. And the Hawaii Ditch Company shall comply with all the provisions of said act and be subject to all its limitations and restrictions therein contained as in this section above set forth, except as provided in section 3 of this bill, and also upon the further condition that the Hawaii Ditch Company shall furnish to all persons desirious of using said water for irrigating purposes such quantity as is reasonable for a fair price; and if the Hawaii Ditch Company and any person or persons desirious of using said water shall not be able to agree as to reasonable use or fair price, then, on the request of either party, the district court of the United States for the Territory of Hawaii shall determine the same and may change its decree from time to time as may seem equitable and just.

SEC. 3. That the work of constructing said ditches or canals and reservoirs shall be commenced within two years and completed within six years from the date of the approval of this act; and in default of either of these conditions the rights herein granted shall be null and void.

That is not in the general law, but it is added in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that makes the bill satisfactory. At least, it makes it satisfactory to me.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will say also that I have a letter from the Delegate [Mr. WILCOX], who is unable to be here, stating that the bill has his full and hearty approval, and that he desires to have it pass.

As the bill has the unanimous approval of the committee, as it calls for no appropriation from the United States, and as it merely asks what is granted everywhere else to companies of this character, I do not think I need detain the committee with any further explanation. I think we have safeguarded all rights fully. If any gentleman desires to know the conditions and stipulations of the general act, I have a copy of it here. They are very strict.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if you please.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not familiar with the bill and was not here when the gentleman began his explanation. Is there any attempt in this bill to dispose of the water or to determine in what manner the water shall be disposed of?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Not the least in the world. It gives no water rights.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there a general law in the Territory of Hawaii relative to the distribution of water similar to our laws in the Western States?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. This company came here with a bill asking us to allow them to exercise the right of eminent domain. They said they owned nearly all the water. We concluded that there was ample authority under the law of Hawaii to exercise that right, and struck out that part entirely.

We simply give them the right to take their ditch across the public lands under the general restriction that applies to all ditches, and we have added the further safeguard which I have stated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Did you say that there were provisions at one time included in this bill relative to the distribution of the water?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. They had a clause asking us to give them the right of eminent domain and to take water, but we struck that entirely out and have simply given them what they have in other places, namely, to cross government land and take materials, etc.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are the rights that are granted here simply rights to cross the public lands without involving the rights of any private parties?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. This does not in the least interfere with the rights of anybody. More than that, it gives this company no exclusive right to cross this land. Any other ditch company would have the same right if Congress would be pleased to grant it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the act to which the gentleman alludes in his statement give them any such rights?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Would the gentleman like to have me read the law?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the gentleman can answer the question without taking up the time of the committee. Does the act alluded to in section 2 protect the abutting owner, or is there any law in Hawaii that protects the abutting owner in the matter of damage done in the making or operation of this aqueduct?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The law in Hawaii in reference to the taking of lands for purposes like this is copied very largely, I think, after the law of one of our Western States; and upon a careful examination of its provisions the committee were satisfied that it safeguarded the interests of all other owners and persons; and therefore we decided not to have anything to do with that part of the bill where they asked us to give them some rights of that kind. We struck that out, and have simply given them the right to cross the public lands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under that law what right of action has the abutting owner against this company in case of damage, or where property is actually taken?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think every property owner along the line of this ditch has petitioned for this bill; but the law to which I refer provides very carefully for the protection of the rights of all persons whose property is taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If they have all petitioned, then they are estopped from asking damages; but it is the first case I ever heard of where everybody petitioned.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I am not aware of anybody who has not. There may be. I believe the parties who petitioned own nearly all the water.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not so much a question of water as it is of land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the bill require this company to complete the ditch within a definite time?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. It requires them to complete the ditch within six years or forfeit their rights. We gave them one more year than the general law gives them, because they claim that in order to make their plans and surveys and send them here to the Secretary of the Interior and have him send some person out there to examine it will take a year longer than it would if it was in this vicinity.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me fifteen minutes?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks in reply to the very able defense made in behalf of the Secretary of State the other day by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I say able argument, but at the same time I must say, Mr. Chairman, a lame argument, not because of any lack of ability upon the part of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, but because of the inherent weakness of the cause which he attempted to defend. The argument made by the gentleman from Illinois was based almost exclusively upon a misapprehension of facts and a misunderstanding of law. In the course of his remarks the gentleman——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. It does not seem to me that the gentleman's discussion is relevant to the question before the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not make that point of order. The other day the gentleman from Texas did not interfere with the conclusion of the bill when he wanted further time. This morning we yielded, when the bill was being discussed under the five-minute rule, several times for gentlemen on the other side to discuss matters irrelevant.

The situation of the House now is that it is doing business without a quorum; the gentleman only asks a few minutes, and I hope he will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not only so, but we are in general debate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We are in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, I have the right to proceed. I do not want this interruption taken out of my time.

In the course of his defense the gentleman from Illinois used this expression:

> The question presented is whether our Government will ask another to permit those in sympathy with the other belligerent to go through their fortified lines.

Now, if the Chairman and gentlemen here please, I say that was not the question. On the contrary, this definition of the question is a pure fiction lodged in the imagination of the gentleman who was assuming to defend the Secretary of State. The proposed mission of Dr. Thomas and his wife is entirely different.

I submit that the mission which Dr. Thomas seeks to undertake will not in any way deal with the belligerent forces opposed to the British army. He does not contemplate going to the succor of ordinary prisoners of war, but wishes to carry aid to the noncombatant prisoners—those women and children not parties to the hostilities, but who have been gathered from their homes in the country districts and the villages into unwholesome camps reeking with disease, as is shown by the following figures based upon British official reports:

> Death rate of children in concentration camps for the month of September, 1901, 433 per 1,000 per annum.
> Death rate of all occupants of camps during the same month, 264 per 1,000 per annum.
> Annual death rate of England and Wales, 18 per 1,000.

These concentration camps are situated in territory controlled by the British and in which the war was long ago officially proclaimed "over." They are in towns on direct lines of railway from British ports, such as Bloemfontein, Kronstad, Johannesburg, Standerton, Mafeking, and Kimberley. It is plain, therefore, that there is no question of passing through "fortified lines" and dealing with "belligerents."

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois raises the question that the officials of the State Department did not raise when this matter was first submitted to them for consideration and action. That Department was not acting unadvisedly. As early as January 7, 1902, this letter was addressed to the State Department:

JANUARY 7, 1902.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a result of negotiations between the members of the committee appointed by his excellency the governor of Illinois to receive funds, etc., for the relief of destitute women and children in the concentration camps of South Africa, and several prominent citizens of Chicago, on the one hand, and Rev. Hiram W. Thomas, D.D., and Mrs. Vandalia Varnum Thomas, on the other, I am in receipt of a letter of which the inclosed is a copy.

It is the desire of the Governor Yates Boer relief fund committee to have Dr. and Mrs. Thomas personally attend to the distribution of the funds collected by it.

I desire, on behalf of the committee, to ascertain what steps it will be necessary for us to take in order to procure for them such passports as will insure access to all of the concentration camps for that purpose.

Any assistance you may render or any information which your Department can furnish will be heartily appreciated.

Yours, very respectfully,

PETER VAN VLISSENGEN,
Member of the Governor Yates Boer Relief Fund Committee.

I now read the letter from Dr. Thomas referred to by Mr. Van Vlissengen in his communication to the State Department:

DE FUNIAK SPRINGS, FLA., January 1, 1902.

Mr. PETER VAN VLISSENGEN, Chicago.

DEAR FRIEND OF THE CAUSE WE LOVE: Our consecration for the new year is to the American Transvaal League for the service of the suffering Boers. From pulpit, platform, and through the press we have pleaded for them; and now we are willing to do.

We hear the words of the Christ, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me."

In the name of God and humanity we are ready to go to that far-off land. Gladly will we be the bearers of the generous offerings and deep sympathies of the people of our country of the free to the noncombatants, the aged, the mothers and children, the sick and the dying, whose husbands and fathers are fighting so grandly for home and country, for the rights of man.

Affectionately,

H. W. THOMAS.
VANDALIA VARNUM THOMAS.

To the letter from Mr. Van Vlissengen to the State Department Mr. David J. Hill, Assistant Secretary of State, replied in a manner which shows that the State Department did not interpose this imaginary rule of international law and regulation of comity between nations, which shadowy objections, owing to the exigencies of the case, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs felt called upon to utilize in order to exculpate the Secretary of State. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 9, 1902.

PETER VAN VLISSINGEN, ESQ.,
Member of "Governor Yates Boer Relief Fund" Committee,
172 East Washington street, Chicago, Ill.

SIR: The Department has received your letter of January 7, stating that your committee desires to have distributed in South Africa funds collected for the relief of destitute women and children, and asking what steps should be taken in order to procure for Dr. H. W. Thomas and Mrs. Vandalia V. Thomas, your agents for the distribution, such passports as will insure their access to all of the concentration camps.

In reply you are informed that if Dr. and Mrs. Thomas are citizens of the United States and will submit satisfactory applications regular passports will be issued in their favor. The Department is informed that a permit should be procured from the British Government by every person desiring to proceed to South Africa, and that no person unprovided with such permit is allowed by the authorities in South Africa to land, except under special circumstances. Permits are issued by the colonial secretary in London on production of satisfactory evidence from the United States embassy that the purpose of the contemplated journey is legitimate, and passengers from ports not in the United Kingdom may obtain such permits from British consular officers at ports of embarkation.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

DAVID J. HILL,
Assistant Secretary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs interposed a defense or objection that Mr. David J. Hill, Assistant Secretary of State, did not raise when the matter was first brought to his attention. Furthermore, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate did not raise this objection when the question was brought to his attention. For the first time, Mr. Chairman, when the issue was presented, the Secretary of State raised this imaginary rule of international law, or fictitious regulation of comity between nations, in order to prevent this relief from being carried to those unfortunate women and children in the concentration camps of South Africa.

Again, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in his argument the other day used this language:

> What would be the answer if such a request had come to Mr. Stanton to let a committee from London who were in sympathy with the Confederate forces go through our armed lines to distribute money among Confederate prisoners?

This does not state an analogous case. We are not asking to distribute relief to Boers who are ordinary prisoners of war, but to Boer women and children.

But, nevertheless, I will submit to him an answer on that proposition. One answer was given by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] the other day. Another is contained in a letter from an assistant surgeon in the Confederate army received by me this morning, which I now ask the privilege of reading:

ATLANTA, GA., March 12, 1902.

Mr. BURLESON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I note in the Associated Press dispatches, Mr. HITT—no doubt a kinsman—asks you "Whether you would have allowed a committee that existed in London in 1863, and which was in full sympathy with the Confederate cause, to go through the Union lines for the purpose of distributing relief?"

We did better than that. I was stationed, as assistant surgeon, at Citypoint, Va., in 1863, afterwards General Grant's headquarters.

Judge Robert Ould was Confederate commissioner of exchange of prisoners, and, I think, General Ord, commissioner for the Federal Government. Major Mulford, United States Army, was Ord's adjutant-general. He and Judge Ould would meet at Citypoint, and they several times discussed their relative matters in my presence during a mutual dining or otherwise.

Judge Ould proposed, with the consent of the Confederate Government, to allow Federal surgeons to treat all Federal prisoners in Confederate prisons, and Andersonville particularly, as well as allow all medical and food supplies for said sick prisoners.

I recall when Major Mulford, United States Army, stated that his Government would not accept this really humane proposition, he did so with sadness and regret. Of course, we—the Confederates present—were shocked.

I think this general fact is a matter of history, but I am one of the surviving witnesses of the negotiations in part, and of the refusal of the Federal Government, as expressed by Major Mulford.

Very respectfully,

V. G. HITT.

On that point, Mr. Chairman, even cruel and tyrannical Spain, when relief was sought to be furnished the Cuban reconcentrado women and children, did not invoke this shadowy principle of international law, this vague and indefinite rule of comity between nations, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] invoked when he attempted his defense of our Secretary of State. I submit to the gentleman a telegram which I will also, with the permission of the House, embody in my remarks, showing that the admittance of relief expeditions by one army through their lines to the succor of those whom they may be engaged in fighting is not without precedent.

Mr. HITT. Why do you not read it?

Mr. BURLESON. Because I have not the time.

OMAHA, NEBR., March 12, 1902.

Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON, M. C.,
1623 N street NW., Washington, D. C.

In 1898 Kansas City Star sent train load of 21 cars' supplies to Cuba. These were distributed by two members of Star staff, sent to Cuba for that purpose. Distribution took place under direction of Brice, consul at Matanzas, who acted by request of Star. President McKinley indorsed plan, and United States Government paid for ship to carry Star supplies. Star was sympathizer with Cubans. The two members of Star staff personally participated in the distribution of these supplies. Red Cross had nothing to do with this, and Consul Brice acted by request of Star.

RICHARD L. METCALF,
Editor World-Herald.

Mr. BURLESON. The cases cited here the other day by the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee in his attempted comparison are not analogous. If General Sherman, in his historic march to the sea, in addition to doing those things that he did do, had concentrated the homeless women and children in camps within the lines of the Federal forces, and the humane people in England had begged for the privilege of sending relief to the women and children confined in these camps, when sickness and death were decimating their numbers, and the Federal Government had admitted its inability to cope with the situation, then the cases would have been analogous.

It is doubtful if there is any precedent in our own history for the granting of such a request as Dr. Thomas seeks to have made upon Great Britain, for the simple reason that history does not record that this country has ever yet placed itself in a position that would warrant such a request. But if the exigency should ever arise when a request of this kind can be made of us, I stand here to assert it will not be refused.

Again, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] used this language:

Mr. HITT. No doubt he could do all that—that is, relieve their distress; but he would not be permitted to go through the armed camps or fortifications. It was never done in our war. I never heard of its being done North or South. If the object is to put our Government in conflict with another for the sake of political capital, I do not think that effort ought to succeed.

Mr. BURLESON. As to what occurred during the unfortunate period of 1861-1865, I am unable to speak from personal knowledge or recollection, inasmuch as I was not of age to participate in the occurrences of that time.

Mr. HITT. I spoke of it because it illustrated a rule universally accepted, a rule that nations generally have adopted.

Now, right on this point, as to whether it is a rule universally accepted, a rule that nations have generally adopted—to show the gentleman how thoroughly mistaken he can be—if this rule of international law applies in our State Department it must be international law purely local in character. I am able to read from an Associated Press cable dispatch of the very morning of our controversy a statement showing that such an interpretation of international law is not rendered in all quarters. Hear the following:

BERLIN, March 11.

In the Prussian Diet the foreign secretary—

So it also seems it was peculiarly proper and appropriate in the case of Dr. Thomas that an appeal should have been made for the good offices of our Secretary of State for the purposes which we were endeavoring to accomplish—the foreign secretary, Baron von Richthofen, after reading the answer of the British Government—

It seems there is one foreign secretary that did not urge these objections; the secretary of one foreign government that did not consider it "meddlesome and a remissness in the observance of neutrality" to lend his good offices to the accomplishment of this worthy purpose—

after reading the answer of the British Government permitting the delivery of German charitable gifts to the Boers in the South African concentration camps, under the surveillance of the camp authorities—

And this regulation, of course, we expected also to obtain if the permit had been granted Dr. Thomas—declared that the reply guaranteed a just distribution.

Now, when an appeal is made in America for the intervention and interposition of the foreign office for the accomplishment of the same thing it is denied.

In 1776 our sires threw off the yoke of British oppression; but after the lapse of one hundred and twenty-five years it seems that the untimely hour has arrived when perfidious Albion again exerts an influence on this country through our foreign office that is discreditable to our patriotism, and in this case has cast a reflection upon our impulses of humanity and well-recognized feelings of generous charity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to say that my only reason for making these remarks to-day is that I had been denied, or warned that I would be denied, the privilege of submitting them when my resolution relating to this subject is presented here to-morrow, as I am told by the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee that he will not present same to-day. I thank you for your attention. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has arisen, I yield back the time to the gentleman from Maine, so he can-use it as he pleases.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that I had permission to insert in my remarks the papers I have alluded to?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks the documents he referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Maine for yielding me the floor; but as in my view this is a debate without any measure before us, any objective point whatever, I will not long abuse the patience of the House. We have already had thrust upon the House three speeches about a resolution which is in a committee, not here, and which is taken as a peg on which to hang speeches. The resolution of inquiry not yet having been adopted nor the answer received, I feel some hesitation in speaking when this land bill is up, merely for the sake of talking in reply to another member who chooses to mention me.

But, thanking the gentleman for allowing me a moment of his time, I will say that in the offhand observations I made a few days ago in reply to long comments by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] upon a resolution of inquiry introduced by him and not yet considered I mentioned some points which were matters of doctrine and procedure in the distribution of funds and supplies to prisoners of war.

The gentleman says that what I then stated was said under an entire misapprehension of facts. His resolution was designed to call for the facts. I think I can now aid in showing them. When that resolution came to the committee a copy was sent, according to the usual custom, to the Department referred to in it, and we received a letter from the Secretary, which came after the discussion here.

It states the facts so briefly and covers the whole ground so completely that I will ask the Clerk to read it at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 12, 1902.

Hon. R. R. HITT,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to the resolution recently introduced in the House of Representatives, I beg leave to make the following statement of facts:

A few days ago a young gentleman called and asked whether this Department would issue passports to the Rev. Mr. Thomas and Mrs. Thomas, who were intending to go to South Africa for the purpose of distributing funds which had been collected in Illinois for the benefit of the sufferers by the war. I said at once the Department would issue the passports desired, and that I would also give Mr. Thomas a letter commending him to every one whom I could influence and asking their assistance in his errand. Inquiry was then made whether this Government would ask of the British Government permission for Mr. and Mrs. Thomas to go at will through the British military lines and camps, a suggestion which I thought impracticable.

This Department is ready at any time to consult with a representative of Governor Yates as to the best means of getting into the proper hands the sums contributed by charitable people in Illinois for the relief of the sufferers by the war in South Africa.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for my supplementing what the Secretary has said so conclusively and fully. As to the detailed criticism made upon the observations I dropped the other day, which were not prepared as a law brief, I might add that what I then said referred partly to the customs for many years and procedures in distributing funds and supplies to prisoners of war not yet so positively and precisely determined by international agreement as now, and therefore with occasional exceptions; but I did mention when I was on the floor the international convention which now provides for all this work through the Red Cross and its officers, who can enter the camps—not go to them merely. And in the second convention of The Hague conference the fourteenth and fifteenth articles provide in long detail the procedure by which neutrals properly authorized and under surveillance may go everywhere—a matter to which reference is manifestly made in the dispatch from Berlin just read.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. If the committee makes no objection, I will now ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Hawaii Ditch Company, Limited, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, granted the right of way to construct and maintain two ditches, to be known as the Upper Kohala Ditch and the Lower Kohala Ditch, through and over the public lands in said island of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii, within the following-described area, to wit: Bounded on the north by the sea, on the east by Waipo Valley, and the summit separating the Waimea watershed from the Kohala watershed, on the south by the summit of the Kohala Mountains, and on the west by Polulu Gulch, said area being known as the "Kohala watershed," and through, over, and upon such other public lands in the districts of North and South Kohala and Hamakua as may be necessary to properly supply the consumers of water, and for the conservation and utilization of waters now running waste into the sea; also the right to construct and maintain reservoirs, dams, impounding embankments, tunnels, feeders, waterways, flumes, inverted siphons, pipe lines, or such other works as may be necessary to conserve and convey the waters of the Kohala watershed along or across said public lands. Said right of way shall be to the extent of the ground occupied by such ditches or canals and reservoirs and their laterals and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof. The Hawaii Ditch Company is also granted the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the ditches or canals and reservoirs such earth and stone or other material as may be necessary for the construction of the same.

SEC. 2. That this right of way through the public lands is granted subject to all the conditions and requirements of the act of March 3, 1901, chapter 561, sections 18 to 21, inclusive. And the Hawaii Ditch Company shall comply with all the provisions of said act and be subject to all its limitations and restrictions therein contained, except as provided in section 3 of this bill, and also upon the further condition that the Hawaii Ditch Company shall furnish to all persons desirous of using said water for irrigating purposes such quantity as is reasonable for a fair price; and if the Hawaii Ditch Company and any person or persons desirous of using said water shall not be able to agree as to reasonable use or fair price, then, on the request of either party, the district court of the United States shall determine the same and may change its decree from time to time as may seem equitable and just.

SEC. 3. That the work of constructing said ditches or canals and reservoirs shall be commenced within two years and completed within six years from the date of the approval of this act; and in default of either of these conditions the rights herein granted shall be null and void.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, page 3, after the word "inclusive," insert "so far as the same shall be applicable."

In line 4, page 3, after the word "contained," insert "as in this section above set forth."

In line 12, page 3, after the words "United States," insert "for the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. POWERS of Maine. These amendments made by the committee are merely verbal. I ask that they be agreed to.

The amendments were adopted.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill No. 11997 and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

The question being taken on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, they were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS of Maine, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO VISIT CONCENTRATION CAMPS, SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution I would like to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the following allegations are made in an editorial printed in The Public, a publication printed in Chicago, Ill.:

"It is hard to believe that the 'understanding between statesmen,' to which the British minister, Mr. Chamberlain, referred a year or so ago, has gone as far as Secretary Hay implied when refusing to ask for passports for Mr. and Mrs. Thomas to enable them to succor the reconcentrado prisoners in South Africa. A committee organized by Governor Yates, of Illinois, has raised funds for the relief of these hapless noncombatant prisoners, and in order to secure its fair distribution, had asked the Rev. Hiram W. Thomas, a well-loved clergyman of Chicago, and his wife, to go to the South African camps and superintend the distributing work. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas consented. But passports from the British Government being necessary, Secretary Hay was duly requested to apply for them to the British ambassador, Lord Pauncefote. Mr. Hay refused to do so, giving as his reason that President Roosevelt would object.

"To such a laudable application it would seem that the British Government itself should have been left to make the objection. Neither Mr. Roosevelt nor Mr. Hay was required to act as a 'buffer.' But our Government, evidently, wished to avoid placing the tory Government of Great Britain in an embarrassing position. Had Mr. Roosevelt requested the passports, and there is no legitimate reason why he should not have done so, but abundant reasons why he should, the British Government would have been obliged either to grant the request or to disclose a cruel churlishness which it prefers to conceal. From this alternative President Roosevelt saves it. These 'understandings between statesmen,' with their little side courtesies in connection with coronations, are curious developments in imperial diplomacy:" Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the House of Representatives whether he declined to comply with the request of the said Rev. Hiram W. Thomas to ask the British Government for passports for the said Rev. Dr. Thomas and his wife to visit South African military camps for the purpose of distributing funds raised in the United States for the relief of noncombatant prisoners.

Having duly considered said resolution and its preamble, reports same back to the House, and recommend its adoption, with the following amendments:

Strike out the preamble down to the word "Resolved."

In line 4 strike out the word "Sais."

In line 5, after the word "Thomas," insert the words "or any person acting for him, for passports or."

In line 6 strike out the word "passports" and insert in lieu thereof the word "permission."

In line 7, after the word "wife," insert the words "or to lend his good offices to secure through the British ambassador a permit from the British war office."

In line 7, after the word "military," insert the word "consideration."

So the resolution will read:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the House of Representatives whether he declined to comply with the request of the Rev. Hiram W. Thomas, or any person acting for him, for passports, or to ask the British Government for permission for the said Rev. Dr. Thomas and his wife, or to lend his good offices to secure, through the British ambassador, a permit from the British war office to visit South African military concentration camps for the purpose of distributing funds raised in the United States for the relief of noncombatant prisoners."

The committee recommends the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does this come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. HITT. Yes; this is a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on a resolution of inquiry sent there, and amendments were made to it, all of which were suggested by the gentleman who introduced it and who has recently addressed the House [Mr. BURLESON], and it has been reported back. Whether it should pass or not, I will not say with positiveness; but the committee did not want to appear to refuse anything; there is no minority report. This resolution has been discussed very frequently here in the House in a series of speeches, while it was not before the House but yet in committee; and I therefore will not attempt to explain it or say much about it. An answer in substance—I believe it might be called an answer—is before the House in the brief conclusive note of the Secretary read by the Clerk a little while ago; and I therefore move the previous question upon the resolution and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments were agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar, with Mr. POWERS of Maine in the chair.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT BUFFALO, N. Y.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from New York, a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, authorized to report a bill.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I move to take up the bill (H. R. 3148) for a marine hospital at Buffalo, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to call up the bill (H. R. 3148) for the erection of a marine hospital at Buffalo, N. Y.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Buffalo, N. Y., a suitable and commodious building for a marine hospital (the plans and estimates for said building to be prepared, examined, and approved in accordance with the law in such cases made and provided), at a total cost which shall not exceed the sum of $125,000 when finally completed: Provided, That no money appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of New York shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same for all purposes during the time the United States shall be and remain the owner thereof.

For the purchase of a suitable site for said hospital, as herein authorized, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be paid out of the permanent appropriation for maintenance of the Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill for the purpose of erecting a marine hospital at Buffalo, N. Y. In the report that has been submitted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it is shown that this is recommended by the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the different marine and seamen's unions along the Great Lakes, the city of Buffalo being one of the largest cities on the lakes, having at the present time a population of nearly 400,000, and as a port of entry and discharge being sixth in the world, and situated as it is at the foot of lake navigation and being headquarters for nearly all the large steamboat companies it must necessarily follow that a proportionately greater number of seamen are employed and discharged at Buffalo than at any other port. Marine hospitals are maintained by the Government at Chicago, Detroit, and Cleveland, and the records show that more seamen are treated at Buffalo than any port on the lakes except, possibly, Chicago. During the past five years there have been 12,971 patients cared for in the hospital at Buffalo, and the report sets out all the reasons why this bill should be passed locating a marine hospital at Buffalo.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported by the committee with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not been read. If there is no further general debate desired, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The following committee amendment was read:

On page 2 strike out all of lines 4 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. MERCER. Do I understand that that amendment strikes out the proviso which takes this money from that particular fund?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT SAVANNAH, GA.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I move to take up the bill (H. R. 1980) to erect a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the committee take up the following bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase such land (or to use such land of the Government as may not be otherwise needed by the Government) and to erect thereon such buildings as, in the opinion of the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, shall be necessary for a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga.

SEC. 2. That the limit of cost shall not exceed $150,000 inclusive of the site or $125,000 exclusive of the site.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to take up the bill (H. R. 1980) to erect a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is a committee amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no demand for general debate, the Clerk will report the bill by sections. I will put the question upon the amendments.

Mr. MERCER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia, do I understand that this bill limits the cost of the building and site to $150,000?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; and the Government already owns a very valuable piece of land which this amendment authorizes shall be sold in order to make up part of that $125,000.

Mr. MERCER. How much will that piece of land bring?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is estimated $25,000.

Mr. MERCER. And then does the bill provide that the money obtained from that sale shall go into the purchase of additional ground?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; they may sell or exchange, but the limit is to include the site.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Government," at the end of line 5, the following: "Or exchange or sell the same to purchase a suitable site."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move that the bill as amended be ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARINE HOSPITAL, PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I move to take up the bill (H. R. 3136) for a public building for a marine hospital at Pittsburg, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the Committee take up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the recommendation of the Marine-Hospital Service and of the Treasury Department——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise procure a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Pittsburg, Pa., a suitable and commodious building for a marine hospital (the plans and estimates for said building to be prepared, examined, and approved in accordance with the law in such cases made and provided), at a cost which shall not exceed the sum of $100,000 when finally completed: Provided, That no money appropriated for said building shall be used until a valid title to the site selected shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Pennsylvania shall have ceded jurisdiction over the same, for all purposes, during the time the United States shall be and remain the owner thereof.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

Strike out all of the proviso.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the recommendations of the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service and of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, after a very full hearing upon this measure, and in consideration of the large inland commerce of the city of Pittsburg, have recommended the passage of this bill with the amendments which they recommend.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I had occasion to investigate this situation myself some time ago, and Pittsburg should have at least $25,000 more than is provided in this bill in order to purchase a proper site for a marine hospital. The ground intended to be purchased is just as valuable, if not more valuable, than the proposed site at Buffalo, and much more valuable than the proposed site at Savannah. I suggest to the gentleman, in view of the fact that this has been a harmonious compromise all around, a sort of three-handed game, as it were, that the bill be amended so that it shall provide a limit of cost of $125,000.

Mr. WANGER. Well, I am inclined to think that the gentleman from Nebraska is right. The amount recommended by the Department was $125,000 for this building and site.

Mr. MERCER. It is absolutely essential. You will have to come here for an increase if it is not authorized now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Nebraska offer that amendment?

Mr. MERCER. I shall offer it as an amendment when it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the adoption of the committee amendment, if there is no demand for further general debate.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER. Now, I offer my amendment, that the limit of cost of site and building be $125,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, after the words "one hundred," insert "and twenty-five."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall oppose the amendment, in the present temper of the committee; but I can not understand why the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] limited his amendment to an increase of $25,000, and why, under the present circumstances, he did not provide for putting up a public building or a marine hospital at every city in the country.

Here is a proposition recommended by the committee, at the request of the Department, for $100,000. The genial gentleman from Nebraska, who is not a member of the committee and not a representative of the State, proposes to add $25,000. Why not authorize some public buildings at the same time?

Mr. MERCER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that for several Congresses bills for marine hospitals have been pending before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman.

We gave this subject quite an exhaustive investigation in the Fifty-sixth Congress. Our investigation included the question of marine hospitals at Buffalo, at Savannah, and at Pittsburg. I know the situation there, and knowing the modesty of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and of some of the other gentlemen interested in this compromise, I thought I would help them out. That accounts for my interference—as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] calls it—in this matter. I think the amendment is meritorious, and that the city of Pittsburg, large as it is, is entitled to the amount that I have proposed.

Mr. MANN. After investigation in the committee I myself am satisfied that probably the city of Pittsburg is more in need of a marine hospital than the other two cities, and if they are to have a marine hospital there they require as much money. I was only struck with wonder and astonishment at the modesty of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who, when he introduced the bill, asked for only a hundred thousand dollars, and stated to the committee that he was satisfied with that amount. I thought then he was wrong. I believe the gentleman from Nebraska is right now in moving to increase the amount, and I am not certain but that it ought to be $150,000; but in the present temper of the committee I wonder at the modesty of any gentleman representing the Public Building Committee that he does not ask for the earth now and be done with it.

Mr. MERCER. Well, you know, I want to pave the way for good feeling when I come on the stage myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. I want to make public confession that I was wrong when I was before the committee, and assent to the gentleman from Nebraska being right now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR SETTLERS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 159.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to take up the bill which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 159) providing for free homesteads on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers in the north one-half of the Colville Indian Reservation, State of Washington, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on taking up the bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the agricultural public lands in the north one-half of the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, opened to settlement by Executive order on the 10th day of October, 1900, who have resided or shall hereafter reside upon the tract entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the land so entered upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry: Provided, That the right to commute any such entry and pay for said lands in the option of any such settler and in the time and at the prices now fixed by existing laws shall remain in full force and effect: Provided, however, That all sums of money so released which if not released would belong to any Indian tribe shall be paid to such Indian tribe by the United States, and that in the event that the proceeds of the annual sales of the public lands shall not be sufficient to meet the payments heretofore provided for agricultural colleges and experimental stations by an act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, for the more complete endowment and suport of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanic arts established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, such deficiency shall be paid by the United States: And provided further, That no lands shall be herein included on which the United States Government had made valuable improvements, or lands that have been sold at public auction by said Government.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this bill places the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation, that is the part of reservation now open to settlement, so that it will be covered by the homestead bill heretofore passed in this House. The Government has never purchased this land from the Indians; it has never paid a cent to the Indians for the land, so that there is absolutely no reason in the world why this land should not be covered only by the provisions of the homestead laws. There is no reason why the settlers upon this land should be required to pay anything more than the settlers upon other public lands. It was set aside in 1872 by Executive order, simply for the Indians of the northwest part of the country, who were put upon this territory.

In 1892 an act was passed expressly declaring that the act vacated the setting aside of this land and confining the reservation to the south half of it. There are about 1,500,000 acres and 2,000 Indians. Every Indian put upon this reservation has had his allotment. Every man, woman, and child has 80 acres. So that the lands thrown open to settlement are lands for which the Government never paid anything—never agreed to pay anything—and if we pass this bill the lands would be exactly in the condition that they were in before the Executive order of 1872. In other words, it would be simply declared to be like any other public lands. The Government could just as well have made the reserve out of what is now the south half as not in the first instance.

If any gentleman desires to ask any question I would be glad to answer it if possible. I will also say that when the so-called "free-home" bill was passed last Congress it was supposed that it covered these lands. The proclamation opening them to settlement was issued before the passage of that bill. No settlement could be made, however, until October 10, 1900, and therefore the Department held that these lands were not covered by that bill. All reasons in support of the "free-home" bill can be urged in favor of this bill in addition to the one suggested above. I will not take the further time of the committee, and if no gentleman desires to ask any questions, I will now move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized. I do not think that the gentleman has the right to close debate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will yield some time to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish the gentleman would yield to me for a few moments now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not need that much; two or three minutes.

I will state, Mr. Chairman, that this reservation ought to have been included in the general homestead act passed two years ago. There is no reason why this particular land should not have been thrown open to homestead entry under the provisions of that bill. The matter has been investigated thoroughly by the Committee on Public Lands, and a unanimous report is made in favor of the bill. It seems to me, therefore, that the bill ought to be favorably reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will yield the gentleman some time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Washington has yielded the floor, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Washington took his seat.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama in his own right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I may be opposed to this bill for reasons that would not address themselves at all and probably do not address themselves at all to the gentleman from Washington or my friend from Colorado. Coming from Western States, their people are interested, naturally, in securing all the tillable lands for the white people of those States, and a question of this kind would naturally address itself to their minds from a different standpoint from that which it addresses my mind. As I understand this proposition, the gentleman from Washington has correctly stated the matter so far as he goes. He says that this land has cost the Government of the United States no money; that they have agreed to pay these Indians nothing for the lands, and therefore we have the right to give it away to settlers.

But the gentleman from Washington has not stated what I understand to be the fact. I understand that this land was originally a part of the Indian reservation. It belonged to these Indians and was owned by them. The United States Government has taken these Indians and moved them off from the reservation. It has not agreed to pay them a cent. It is true they had not made any treaty with the Indians to pay them for the land, but there is no question that it was originally a part of their reservation. Where we have moved other Indians off from their reservation and sold it and given it to settlers, it is the custom of the Indians to be paid for the land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would suggest to the gentleman that there was never any treaty with these Indians. They are like other Indians roving around the country. In 1872, by an Executive order, they were confined to this territory. It was not a reservation as we understand the term reservation now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that. There is no dispute between the gentleman and myself about the facts of the case. I say the Indians were put on the land by the Government. They were entitled to some place on the face of the earth whereon to rest their feet. They acquired a home there. They were gathered in there and when they were pushed back by the white settlers, they had to have some place to rest. They were put on this reservation and it had become their home; but the greed of the settlers pushed on and on and found out that this was arable and tillable land and they wanted it, and therefore they proceeded to make the Government take it.

Well, the Government did take it, and drove the Indians off. There have been some efforts to negotiate a treaty with the Indians to compensate them for the land that was taken away from them, but that treaty has never been successfully made. It has never been consummated, nothing has ever been done with it, and yet they were moved off. That was the only home they had, the only one they had on earth. It has been taken away from them by the Government and no treaty has been made with them. There is no compensation agreed upon, but in equity and justice this Government has got, some day, unless it proposes to starve these Indians to death, to provide some compensation for this land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that this argument should have been made against the original proposition rather than against this bill here?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it ought to have gone against the bill when it was originally up, but the Government still owns the land, and it has up to this time refused to make a treaty with these Indians and fix a compensation that the settlers shall pay who receive the land. Now, the gentleman says the land did not cost the Government anything; therefore we can give it away. Of course it has not cost the Government anything. We went in by the strong arm of the Federal Government and took it away from the Indians. It has not cost the Government anything because we declined to pay for it and preferred to take it. I say that in all equity and justice instead of opening this reservation and giving it away to the white settlers of the country, the Government ought to fix a price upon the land, and let the people who want it buy it and give the returns to these Indians that they did the injustice to, even if it was in 1870 when that injustice was done.

Mr. McCLEARY. I would like to ask the gentleman for information. Who owned this land before the Indians were located upon it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it was a part of the public domain, as I understand it. It was a part of that unclaimed West that belonged to the Government of the United States or to the Indians, and as civilization drove them back the Government finally located them within these lines and said, "There is your reservation, and there we will keep you."

Mr. McCLEARY. Where are they now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not state.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They are on the south half of the reservation. They have 1,500,000 acres, and there are about 2,000 Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only reason which can be given for giving it away to white settlers without making them pay for it is the question of greed—we saw something we wanted and therefore we went and took it. I do not see any justice in that proposition. I think if the land is to be opened for settlement it ought to be opened like other Indian reservations; let the settlers pay for it and let the proceeds go to the Indians, who originally held it and who were put there by the United States Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I only want a few minutes. The position the gentleman has taken is a position that was discussed on the former bill. The situation in relation to the Western States and large Indian reservations may be a mistake. It retards the settlement in that State. It is not a question of compensation to the Indians; it is a matter which has got to be fixed and can not be fixed by stating or fixing any price on the land contained in the reservation. That has got to be determined either by treaty stipulation or in any other way that the Government thinks is equitable. The purpose of opening the reservation is for the settlement of the reservation, and if the Government owes anything to the Indians by reason of taking the land or for any other purpose, it ought to settle it from the general funds. Nearly every State has had to pay sums of money for the lands they obtained from the Indians.

In this instance they did not ask that the settler be made to pay $1.25, $1.50, or $2 an acre. They provided that the land should come within the rule of the homestead act, just as was done with respect to several million acres of land recently opened to settlement under the homestead act. It is not right that one part of the country should be made to contribute out of the funds of settlers for the operations of the homestead act, when that act has been applied to all the lands obtained from the United States, no matter what price may have been paid to the Indians for the extinguishment of their title.

The fact that we passed the homestead act, and that we have made this law applicable to all Indian Reservations in the United States except a very few, shows, it seems to me, that we ought to deal with the same fairness toward the other States that still have some reservations.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not a fact that all political parties have declared in favor of a free-homestead law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; all the political parties in the United States of which I have any knowledge have declared that this should be the policy, that the money necessary to pay the Indians for their title should not come out of the settler. This is only fair toward the State of Washington if it has within its limits an Indian reservation that could come under the operations of the homestead act.

Mr. McRAE. I have not examined this bill, and I would like to ask whether there is any legislation in it except that relating to this reservation—whether it makes any change in the general law?

Mr. LACEY. It applies only to this particular reservation. By a departmental construction it has been held that the original homestead act did not apply to this reservation.

Mr. McRAE. Does it invalidate any homestead rights?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. It simply includes this particular reservation in the provisions of the general free-homestead act. It was supposed at the time that act was passed that it covered this reservation, but it has been held that it does not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to move that the Committee of the Whole take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3084) for the relief of bona fide settlers in forest reserves.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of House bill 3084, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where a claimant under the settlement laws of the United States within the limits of a forest reserve created under the provisions of section 24 of the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," has failed, by reason of ignorance of the proclamation of the President, or of the filing of the township plat of survey, or from unavoidable accident, to place his claim of record within the statutory period, such claimant may be permitted to file his claim in the proper United States land office and receive patent therefor upon showing due compliance with the law under which the claim is asserted, notwithstanding the reservation, provided that he made bona fide settlement upon the land claimed prior to the date of the proclamation establishing the forest reserve and maintained continuous residence thereon for the requisite period.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 10, after the word "accident," insert "or conditions, or from misunderstanding of the law."

After the word "permitted," in line 12, insert "within a period of two years from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, a few words will make the purpose of this bill perfectly clear. The bill as originally drafted was introduced in cooperation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in whose annual report its provisions are embodied. The object of the bill is to relieve certain settlers on forest reserves who have made their homes there prior to the establishment of the reservation, but who have failed to make their filings within ninety days after the completion of the survey.

The general rule is that settlers must make their filings within ninety days from the completion of the plat and its filing in the land office. But the failure to do this has always been interpreted to be of no serious consequence, provided the filing is made at any time before an adverse claim comes in. The Department of the Interior has interpreted that the establishment of a forest reservation by Presidential proclamation is in the nature of an adverse claim, and therefore if filings were not made within ninety days as prescribed, however long the settler may have resided on the land, he loses his rights.

The Commissioner earnestly recommends that relief should be given by Congress in these cases. The bill carries no appropriation. It simply allows the people who are still living on those lands to do what they ought to have done previously—that is, file or make their entries. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands with the recommendation of two amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How many settlers are to be relieved by this legislation?

Mr. MARTIN. In the Black Hill Forest Reserve, with which I am more particularly acquainted, the number of settlers affected is from 50 to 100. In the other reserves there are comparatively few, I am told. These settlers on the Black Hill Reservation have been there on an average of from fifteen to twenty years. They have established their homes there. And now, by reason of mere carelessness or misunderstanding, they are in danger of losing their lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does this bill give them their title or merely give them the right to preempt?

Mr. MARTIN. It confers no new right upon them save to make their filings, which they ought to have made previously,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But they must have continued to live on the land?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir. This bill provides in terms, not only that they must have continuously resided upon the reserve, but must have maintained their cultivation and other acts of settlement according to law.

Mr. LACEY. And there are only a very few of them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield to me a moment?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield for one minute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This bill, as I understand, is purely to legalize the title of these settlers to their homes on this particular forest reservation. They have been subjected to great hardships. They have been in danger of eviction as having no legal rights, although they have established their homes there and invested considerable sums of money. On account of the extreme hardship of the case and the justice of this measure of relief, it has been recommended unanimously by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken on the amendments reported by the committee, they were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon laying aside the bill as amended, with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the several bills considered.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to rise takes precedence. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the committee do now rise and report the several bills that have been under consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The first matter in order is the report of the chairman.

Mr. POWERS of Maine, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry House bills, and had directed him to report the same with the recommendation that the amendments proposed by the committee be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will ask if it is in order to challenge the correctness of the statement made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House to the Speaker? I raise the point that no vote was taken in the Committee of the Whole ordering the committee to rise and report those bills to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington will readily see that the Chair can not hold a court of inquiry as to the action of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is a matter that the House only knows from the report of its Chairman. The Clerk will report the first bill.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved. It is approved.

SUBTREASURY BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 13, 1902.

SIR: The assistant treasurer in the city of San Francisco has advised this office that he is unable longer to exchange silver certificates for standard silver dollars for want of vault room in which to store the coin.

There are something over $32,000,000 in standard silver dollars now in the vaults of the subtreasury at San Francisco, and all available space is crowded to the utmost. Because of this congested condition the assistant treasurer is physically unable to obey the plain mandates of the statute.

The subtreasury building at San Francisco, erected nearly thirty years ago, is unfortunately located. It stands upon a narrow side street, which, in the language of the assistant treasurer, has been long since abandoned to Chinese, cheap liquor shops, and degraded white persons.

I attach hereto a copy of a letter received from the Treasurer of the United States explaining the situation somewhat more in detail, and I submit this communication that Congress may be fully advised of existing conditions, to the end that wise and adequate provision may be made for the rapidly growing business of the subtreasury at San Francisco. Two ways are suggested; either the erection of a separate structure or the construction of adequate vault room in the new custom-house about to be erected in that city, designed and set apart for the use of the subtreasury.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is a little uncertain as to where this communication should go. Shall it go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should think that that would be the proper reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and printed.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the committee report a measure that the Government shall spend the silver for a new building.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will state that the bill will be open to amendment when it is reported, and the Senator can move to amend it as he likes.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, there was a unanimous agreement to vote upon the bill at 3 o'clock on Monday. I do not know how many Senators are expected to address the Senate, but I should like to get unanimous consent that on Monday speeches shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and the time divided between the two sides. Probably all those who have long speeches to make can make them to-day. I think it would be fair that for the two or three hours on Monday there should be some equitable division of time. Several Senators have said that they would like to make very short speeches. I will ask anyway for consent that on Monday, after the bill comes before the Senate, speeches shall be limited to fifteen minutes on a side.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall object to the last part of that request. I do not like to have the Senate get into the custom of a recognition of having two sides of a question.

Mr. BERRY. I did not include that.

Mr. HOAR. There may be three or four sides.

Mr. BERRY. I did not include that in the request. I asked that speeches be limited to fifteen minutes each.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator suggested that the time be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. BERRY. I made that statement, but when I made the request I left that part out.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is right. The Chair will take care of that.

Mr. BERRY. I supposed so, and that is the reason why I left it out.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Mr. President, I intended to give notice that I should like on Monday to have about a half hour. Of course I have had no opportunity to reply to any of the speeches which have been made, and being in the chair I do not feel at liberty to go from the chair and to be interrupting Senators when they are making their speeches.

Mr. BERRY. I will modify the request and ask that the bill be taken up at the conclusion of the morning business on Monday, and that speeches be limited to fifteen minutes each, except as to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who shall have thirty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BERRY. Is that satisfactory, that speeches should be limited to fifteen minutes except as to the Senator from Maine, who shall have thirty minutes?

Mr. FRYE. That ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BERRY. It is satisfactory to me.

Mr. FRYE. I am obliged to the Senator for making that request.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask that if it is understood that the bill is to be taken up before 2 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. BERRY. I meant to ask that the bill be taken up immediately after the routine morning business——

Mr. CLAY. All right.

Mr. BERRY. And that speeches be limited to fifteen minutes, except as to the Senator from Maine, who shall have thirty minutes. That was the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. MONEY. I understand that the arrangement is to vote at 3 o'clock on the bill. Is that true?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MONEY. In that case I would ask the Senate to meet earlier than the usual hour. I move that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am informed that there are several Senators who desire to speak to-day if they have an opportunity, and I do not intend to speak at any great length upon this bill. In fact, I had not intended to speak at all on the bill until within a day or two.

I join, Mr. President, with everybody who wants to secure a merchant marine for the United States. I am inclined to think that the war vessels of the United States are about sufficient for our purpose, but we have not for the necessary carrying of our exports and imports such vessels as we ought to have. While in time of peace I do not see very much except sentiment in the suggestion of the necessity for American ships, I realize that if there should come a war between some of the great powers of the world under whose flag we are sailing some of our ships, we might have some trouble, and that the carrying capacity might be so lowered as to seriously interfere with the affairs of the country. To that extent I agree it is exceedingly desirable that we should have a merchant marine of our own. I do not think myself it would make much difference whether the American citizen sails his ship under our flag or the flag of some other nation, except as a mere matter of sentiment.

We pay out usually, it is said, $200,000,000 in freight a year. I do not suppose anybody knows what we pay, but that is as good a figure as any other to put it. The greater part of it, of course, goes into the hands of foreigners. All of the money paid to foreign shipowners, of course, goes into foreign hands, but not necessarily all the money that is paid to ships sailed under foreign flags or documented in foreign lands. The Commissioner of Navigation tells us that we have about twice as much shipping owned by American citizens documented in foreign countries as we own documented in this country. The profit, whatever it may be, from that source comes to us. It comes to citizens of the United States. As I said yesterday, if there is any great sentiment in it we can put the American flag over every one of those ships owned by citizens of the United States or owned by corporations of which American citizens own a majority of the stock.

I have on various occasions expressed my anxiety on this subject, and I have voted, I believe, for every proposition that ever came up that commended itself to me as calculated to in any degree extend American ownership of the ships that carry the products of the United States to foreign lands. In 1891 I was induced by its supporters to vote for a bill that it was promised us would bring about a restoration of the position in the carrying trade of the world that we formerly occupied. After ten years of experience under it I do not find anybody who is willing to admit that it has been of any great benefit to us. It certainly did not do what it was promised it should do. It did not secure to us new markets. It did not secure to us ships sailing in sections of the world that we desire they should sail. Whatever money we have paid out over and above what we ought to have paid properly for the carrying of the United States mail has been a gratuity to the shipowners, and so far as the public is concerned it has been a waste.

Last year we had a proposition of a different method which we were told then, if we would adopt it, would certainly bring about a restoration of our carrying trade. I am not going to vote, Mr. President, for this bill, but I want to say that, in my judgment, while it is not a very satisfactory bill, it is infinitely preferable to the bill of the last Congress. It is a bill that it seems to me, unless there is favoritism in the Department, will give every shipowner at least a fair show, which the other bill did not, in my judgment.

If I believed what the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] believes, that this bill would bring about what he believes it would bring about, I should vote for the bill on the same ground that I voted for the bill in 1891.

I should much prefer to try what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] spoke of yesterday, the old rule that we adopted in the very early history of this country, which worked admirably until we thought we were strong enough to do without it and abandoned it, and that is discriminating duties. I am not insensible to the fact that such a measure is objectionable to those who think that under no circumstances should we render any special compensation to shipowners in order to induce the building of a merchant marine, but it has some advantages that this bill does not have. Under the discriminating duties nobody gets anything unless he earns it. Unless a shipowner brings the goods into the country or takes them out he gets nothing out of it. If he brings them in under discriminating duties, he gets a bounty for so doing—that is, he gets an advantage over any foreign shipowner, and to that extent we reduce the revenues, and therefore it may be said to be a bounty. But if he brings in foreign goods and has ships of a character also to take our exports, which he carries out, that is desirable, as we all admit.

Under this bill a shipowner, I suppose, will naturally get all the freight that he can, unless he enters into a combination with some other ship company that he will not carry freight, or that he will carry only a limited amount. But he gets the same whether he carries a full cargo or an empty cargo. In the bill of last year, which I think was very objectionable on account of other features, there was a provision that the shipowner should carry at least 50 per cent of the capacity of his ship in order to entitle him to the bounty which that bill provided for. This bill allows him to sail empty if he sees fit, and to return empty if he sees fit. In these days of combinations, in these days when great sums are paid by railroad companies and ship companies to other ship companies, provided that they will not interfere with the trade of some other ship organization or company, it is left open, I think, to the carrying of a very small freight with a fairly large bounty.

This bill is objectionable to me in another point. It does not provide for any new lines, and it will be like the act of 1891; we shall pay out our money on the old-established lines, if we pay it out at all.

The purpose of the bill is professedly to establish new lines, and we are told on the floor of the Senate by its advocates that that is what it will do. I realize that there is some trouble providing in a bill like this for the establishment of a line between the city of New York and some South American port, and yet I do not believe we are going to get any considerable increase of shipping to that section of the world unless we provide that the ships that are to have this bounty shall sail from New York to some port there.

The great export and import trade of this country is of course with Europe. We have not built up, and do not seem to be able to build up, any considerable trade in the South American countries. We have not up to the present time succeeded in building up a very large trade with Asiatic countries. There are more hopes of that, however, in the future than of the trade with South America, in my judgment. Twenty years ago I recall that we provided a commission to go to South America to secure, if possible, a greater trade. We sent three distinguished gentlemen down there, and they spent a year or so and came back, and I believe that after they came back the trade continued just about as before.

The truth is, Mr. President, that the trade perhaps is not quite sufficient between us and South American ports at the present time to induce shipowners to put on their lines, and if we are going into the bounty business it seems to me that that is the place where we ought to apply our bounty. Under this bill it may be possible to do that, but it is equally possible that not a dollar will go in that direction except to the lines that are now established. I am speaking now of the establishment of some new lines.

Mr. President, there is another view of this question which I wish to submit very briefly, and that is whether we can build ships in this country at the same cost at which they can be built in Europe. I was surprised when the chairman of the Committee on Commerce announced the other day that it costs 25 per cent more to build a ship in the United States than in a European shipyard, and that statement has been reiterated on the floor of the Senate by the friends of the bill. On the other hand, those who are opposed to the bill, those who do not take that view, have put into the RECORD what seems to me to be very positive evidence that there was a mistake as to that matter, and that if there was any difference in the cost it was so little that it could hardly be considered.

I know the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] said the evidence that you could not build an American ship as cheaply as you could build it in Europe was established by the fact that a large number of capitalists of New York had expended a very large sum, which I understand is $15,000,000 to $18,000,000, in the purchase of foreign-built ships. Mr. President, that does not establish the fact that they could not have bought American ships, if there had been any to be bought, just as cheaply as they bought those. The truth is that when they determined to organize a ship company of the kind they did they wanted the ships, and whether they could be built cheaper in the American yards or not, the American yards could not build them under the present conditions in less than from three to five years. I do not think I shall misstate if I say that to-day no 10,000-ton ship can be built in any established yard in the United States under three or four years, not because of their lack of capacity to build, but because the yards have been already supplied with all the work that they can do. But under any circumstances one of these great ships could not be built under a couple of years.

The necessity of this new shipping organization was for immediate ships. They wanted them at once. They could not go to the public and raise $15,000,000 and say you must lie out of your money for five years or four years or three years, whatever the time might be. So they bought the ships that were on hand and that could be bought.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] said that they did not intend to sail them under the American flag, and I suppose they do not unless we change the law, simply because they can not. But I do not know why they should not come to Congress as they came twelve years ago, when Congress allowed them to put two amongst the largest ships then in use on the Atlantic Ocean under an American register, provided they would build two more in this country. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce told us yesterday that the two ships they built cost $1,400,000 more than if built abroad, if I understood the figures aright. There was a good deal of confusion in the Chamber at the time, but I think that was the amount he stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One million one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TELLER. I thought it was $1,400,000. He stated that for $1,100,000 less the ships could have been built in a foreign yard. Mr. President, I do not know what the proof of that is, but it is very startling and surprising to me if that is a correct statement.

In the first place, if the Commissioner of Navigation is correct, who is supposed to know more about this matter than I do at least, because I am not a shipping man in any sense of the term, there is not any great advantage in documenting a ship in the United States. He says, at least, that there is practically none, and why should the great concern of which Mr. Griscom is the head and the principal man, as I understand, want to get two ships documented and be willing to put up as a bonus, for that is what it amounts to, $1,100,000 for the privilege of running four ships under the American register?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please state in this connection what the advantage is?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know what it is, and nobody in this debate has told me what it is. I do not see any advantage that Mr. Morgan's company would have in registering these ships under an American register. I suppose there is some little advantage, but what it is I do not know, and the Commissioner substantially says that there is not any advantage.

Mr. BACON. In tonnage dues?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, I suppose there are some slight tonnage dues, perhaps; but not much.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could they not be admitted to the coastwise trade if given American registry?

Mr. TELLER. No; we did not allow those ships to enter the coastwise trade, as I recollect. I may be mistaken, but I think those ships were not allowed to enter the coastwise trade. I am pretty sure that they were not. As I said yesterday, they need not pay that great sum to fly our flag on their ships, because they can fly it now with a Belgian register, a Haitian register, if they want, or any other register in the world. When the time comes that these ships owned by American citizens are in trouble they appeal to the American Government and not to the government under which they are documented. Great Britain is not by international law under any obligation to take care of the ships that are documented in her register. They are not owned by citizens of Great Britain. The American citizen applies to the American Government and the Englishman applies to his Government for protection of property on the high seas.

Mr. RAWLINS. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to direct his attention to this point. It has been suggested that in case of war between foreign countries the ship flying a foreign flag instead of our own might be at a disadvantage. In that connection, is there any reason why the ships which are now carrying the British flag in case of a war with some other country should assume an American register and fly the American flag so as to avoid the dangers that would otherwise be encountered?

Mr. TELLER. The law of nations is that no Englishman can come here and register his ship and run it under our flag in time of war to escape any liability that would exist as an English citizen. Our regulations provide for that now. If anybody desires to sell his ship to a citizen of the United States he must produce proof that it is a bona fide transaction, that it is not a sale in order to escape some risk that he might have as a Belgian citizen, or something of that kind. He must produce authority to show that it is a bona fide transaction before the citizen to whom he transfers it is entitled to claim the protection of the United States Government.

Mr. RAWLINS. That answers, it seems to me, the very point on which I desired information. But assuming a war between the United States and a foreign country, would there not be considerable advantage in the fact that ships carrying our foreign exports and imports are under a foreign flag instead of our own?

Mr. TELLER. That is a question I do not feel quite competent to decide. The presumption of law is that when you see an American flag over a ship it is owned by an American citizen; that when you see a British flag over an American ship it is owned by a British citizen; but I believe that that is a fact to be determined, and if the fact is that it is a British subject who owns it with the American flag flying over it, or, vice versa, if it is an American ship with an English flag flying over it, it becomes subject to the rules of war when we are at war with any other power.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I believe that would be the law, although I would not undertake to say at first blush absolutely that it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose our ships are sailing under the English flag and England be at war, what then?

Mr. TELLER. Then the presumption is that it is an English ship.

Mr. HOAR. I am not speaking of the presumption, I am speaking of the absolute disclosure of the fact in a prize court. If an American shipowner, flying the English flag when England is at war with Germany, is captured and taken into a German prize court, would they hold him to his election of the flag or go behind that and say it was an American ship?

Mr. TELLER. I think the prize court would very likely hold that it was an English ship. Whether the Government of the United States might then intervene under the general rule that every government must take care of the property of its own citizens on the high sea, is another question. Those are questions that I do not want to settle, because I do not know.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest just there whether there is any general principle that a government must take care of its own citizens on the high seas when they are voluntarily flying a foreign flag.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know about that. We have denied to the American citizen the right to register his ship if he did not have his ship made in an American shipyard. It has been decided again and again that the right is a natural right to buy ships wherever they are made, and I do not believe that it would be possible to pass a law saying that no American citizen should own a foreign ship.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but the proposition which I suggest to him and suggest in connection with what he has said is this, that the flying of a foreign flag, however the man may have been driven into it, is an election on his part of the foreign protection instead of that of his own country, and if the foreign country be at war and the ship be captured he takes the consequences of that election.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question myself for information. Take the new shipping company that has bought out the English ship company and is practically an American company, because with a trifling exception they have all the stock that controls the company. I understand that some preferential stock belongs, perhaps, abroad. They put up the English flag, and it is an American corporation practically. It is American citizens who own it. Perhaps it would be a better illustration if I would say, suppose Mr. Morgan had bought one of these great ships, and, as he could not document it under our law, suppose he had documented it in Great Britain where it was built. Suppose, then, he puts up the British flag, will Great Britain take care of his rights on the high seas in a state of war? That is the question.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose so. Of course, that depends on her local arrangements; but I understand that registering a ship in England and flying the English flag over it is an election by the owner of the nationality of that vessel. Whether we drive him to it or not is another point. I understand, and when I say I understand I do not profess to know—I daresay the Senator who says he knows nothing about it knows a great deal more about it than I do——

Mr. TELLER. No; I did not say I did not know anything. I know some little about it.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt the Senator knows more about it than I do; but the impression under which I put the question was that that is an election of nationality for his ship, and that so far as he is concerned he must take the consequences, and can not help himself. So far as the country which registers the ship and lets him fly the flag is concerned, it is a question how far they will go in protecting him; and so far as the country capturing him goes, it is for their discretion how far they will go in exonerating him. That is my impression as to what is the rule.

Mr. TELLER. If a large fleet of ships which had been built and documented in England and were run under her flag were owned by citizens of our country, I doubt very much whether Great Britain would be willing to assume the responsibility for those ships which she would assume with reference to ships owned by her own subjects.

Mr. HOAR. If they were fighting foreigners they would assume all the responsibility of damaging the nation with which they were at war.

Mr. TELLER. Those are not questions that we have particularly to deal with to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. The time might come when we should have to deal with them. If there should be war between Great Britain and France, the people owning these ships, of which there are twice as many tons, according to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, as are run under our own flag in the ocean trade, I suppose would be here in fifteen minutes with a bill under some terms to transfer their ships so that they could be documented in this country, and we should have to pass it in great haste. It would not take us fifteen minutes to do it, and we could not do otherwise.

We want and we must have the means of transportation; and, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], we would want to protect the property of our own citizens. I understand that citizens of the city of New York have put from fifteen to eighteen million dollars in a line of steamships. That may be exaggerated. We have just as much interest in protecting the citizens of the United States who have that property as we have in protecting citizens who have $100,000 invested in ships documented in the United States and flying our flag.

You can not attach any lack of patriotism to those people because their vessels are documented in a foreign country. That is what determines the character of a ship, and not the flag under which she sails, because, as I have shown, the owners of a vessel can run upon it our flag, if they see fit to do so, but naturally they feel, if they are privileged to document a ship in England, that they ought to run it under the flag of England.

But suppose a war should come on. In that case we should have to do, under pressure of circumstances, what we decline now to do. We decline now to allow any citizen of the United States to go to Europe and buy a ship, bring it here, place it under our registry, and put it under our flag in the proper sense of the term while it becomes an American-owned ship. There are a large number of instances in which we have allowed that to be done, but always under some special circumstances. I do not recall a particular instance now, but I can remember since I have been in the Senate a great number of bills granting American registers to ships passed in that way. I recall no instance where there was ever a controversy, except there was a little debate as to the City of Paris and the City of New York when it was proposed that they should be admitted to American registry. I believe I myself did have the temerity to suggest that if it was a good thing to allow the City of Paris and the City of New York to be registered here on condition that the owners of those vessels should build two other ships in this country, it would be a good thing to make the law general, so that if a man bought a ship in Europe he could register it in the United States if he would build here another ship of the same kind. There has been a pretty strong feeling in the United States that that ought to be done.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, in 1898 and 1899, recommended such legislation in very positive terms, and the Commissioner of Navigation in his last report recommends it. I do not know whether or not the late Secretary of the Treasury was a Republican; but I suppose at least that recommendation was upon Republican authority in that branch of the service. I do not know what the politics of the Commissioner of Navigation may be, but I know that he has also indorsed the proposition that our people should be allowed to buy foreign ships in order to establish an American merchant marine.

I have never until recently felt that it would be a wise thing to have what are called free ships, and I doubt now whether I should be ready to put the American shipyards in competition with those of Europe in building ships; but I am quite ready, and have been for ten years, barring the right of ships built in foreign yards to participate in the coastwise trade, to give to citizens of the United States the right to buy ships in foreign ports for the Atlantic and Pacific trade. I do not believe that any ship built in United States yards anywhere need cost 25 per cent or 10 per cent or 5 per cent more than a similar ship would cost in European yards.

But the truth is, Mr. President, we have been adding immensely to our domestic Navy because we have a domestic commerce so great that it has required practically all of the shipyards of this country to supply that commerce and the few ships for foreign trade that our yards have built. Notwithstanding it was said here the other day by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] that there were no ships on the ways and that the men were all idle, or something of that kind, I say there is not any evidence which can be produced to-day here or anywhere else by any respectable authority to deny the proposition I am now going to make—that in the whole history of this country, since the decadence of our shipping began in 1855, there never has been as much demand upon our shipyards as there has been in the last two years and as there is to-day. There is not a shipyard in the United States of any considerable capacity that has not got plenty of work, not only for this year, but very much for the next.

The Commissioner of Navigation tells us that the last year was the best shipbuilding year ever known, not only in the United States, but throughout the world. We have held our own in shipbuilding when we take the ships we have built for the lake trade, the coastwise trade, and the other ships we have built. We began last year with 68 ships being built, and we entered into this fiscal year with 89 ships being built; the 68 ships being of smaller tonnage than the 89 ships—that is, the tonnage of the 89 will be greater in proportion than the number of ships—and yet we are told that we can not build ships. Why can we not build them, Mr. President? We have better timber. We have—I will not say better, but as good iron and steel as can be found anywhere else in the world, and iron and steel have been cheaper until the great trust was formed, when they put up the price. We have been shipping iron and steel to Europe to be used in shipbuilding in the last two years. I do not know that we have shipped any for the last eight or ten months since the trust went into operation, because they put up the price; but previous to that time we did ship to Europe material for the building of ships.

Mr. President, I want to read a few words from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation. As I have said, I do not know what the politics of the Commissioner of Navigation may be; but I know that he is an advocate of bounties for ships. As far as he dared to do so or could do so, consistently with the facts before him, all the way through in this report, he has attempted to show that it is necessary that some aid should be extended in order that our shipping should resume its proper place in the ocean trade. In the very beginning of his report he says:

> The fiscal year ended June 30, 1901, has been the third successive year of notable prosperity and growth in the shipbuilding and shipowning industries of the United States and of the whole world. In every essential respect the record at home has surpassed even the remarkable records of the two preceding years. The extent and nature of the work under way or projected in our shipyards give promise that the current fiscal year will record a greater growth than that of the year just ended.
>
> The total documented tonnage of the United States on June 30, 1901, has been exceeded but once in our history—on June 30, 1861.

He says further:

> The total tonnage built in the United States during the past fiscal year was the greatest in our history, except during the years 1854 and 1855.
>
> * * * * * * *
> By the end of the current fiscal year possibly half of our tonnage in foreign trade for the first time will be steel steamers, the instrument of commerce which for some years has been chiefly employed by foreign nations.
>
> The following table shows the geographical distribution, motive power, and material of construction, and trade of vessels of the United States for the fiscal year 1901, compared with the fiscal year 1900, and also for the construction for the two years.

In the table referred to there is at least 70,000 tons of shipping not counted, which belong to the Philippine service at the present time.

The Commissioner of Navigation again says:

> While the increase in registered steam tonnage, 88,380 tons, is the largest in our history, it is to be regretted that of itself it does not indicate ability to compete with foreign shipping for the carrying trade.

Not only, Mr. President, have we built a great number of ships, but we have increased the size of them.

Again, the Commissioner says:

> The hopeful feature of the figures rests in the fact that in 1900 the average size of our registered steam vessels was 1,010 gross tons, while in 1901 it was 1,210 gross tons.
>
> * * * * * * *
> During the past fiscal year 1,580 vessels of 483,489 gross tons have been built and documented in the United States.

Then he touches on the world's capacity, etc. I shall skip that. Further on the Commissioner says:

> For the purpose at hand, accordingly, an analysis of the vessels of 1,000 tons or upward built in the United States will suffice. There were 112 such vessels, aggregating 311,778 gross tons, built and documented in this country during the past fiscal year.

Then follows in this report a list of vessels of over 1,000 tons, built in the United States and officially documented during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901.

Mr. President, I said I was not going to take much time, and so I shall only call attention to a few of these matters, and then I shall conclude my remarks.

The Commissioner of Navigation says further in his report:

The total output of ocean steel steamers on the seaboard, 16, of 76,374 gross tons, is modest when compared with the corresponding construction of Great Britain and Germany, which devote themselves almost wholly to this form of construction.

Mr. President, other nations have not the great inland seas nor have they such an enormous coast line as we possess. A ship that leaves Portland and goes to Galveston is not considered in the ocean trade. That vessel is engaged in coastwise trade. So, I suppose, the ship that goes from San Francisco to Manila will also be considered as in the coastwise trade when we come to make up the statement of our position in the world's commerce.

In this report is a statement of all the ships that are now being built in the United States, and I submit that if any Senator has read this report he is not likely to state on the floor of the Senate that the shipbuilding industry of the United States is languishing. I commend this report to the Senators who have been insisting that we can not avoid, on account of the languishing condition of the industry of shipping, giving a bounty to the building of ships, or rather a bounty to the running of ships, which is supposed to induce the building of them.

I stated, Mr. President, that the price of steel in this country was lower than in Great Britain. During the year 1900 it was very much lower, and so it was during the fore part of the year 1901. The Commissioner of Navigation has not dealt with the later months, but I understand since that time the price has been raised in this country, so that it equals or perhaps exceeds that in Great Britain.

Mr. President, we are building ships, and we are building them, I think, as rapidly as the interest of the country requires that we should. A distinguished financier and operator has already built two of the greatest ships of the world on the New England coast, and he has two more being built. These ships are to run from Seattle to some point on the Asiatic coast. They are built in connection with a railroad, and I suppose it will not be denied that the purchase of the Leyland Line by Mr. Morgan and others was for the purpose of assisting railroads running into the great city of New York, so as to give them a continuous line from their Western termini to European ports.

We have reached a point in our history when the railroads are not going to stop at the coast. The railroad companies are going to build these ships, and just now when the tendency and the trend is to build ships for these great lines of railway, we are told that we must immediately assist in putting this languishing industry of shipping on its feet by the payment of bounties. There would perhaps have been some sense and some propriety ten years ago in passing a law of this character, but there is not any now, because it is not needed. There is not any great continental line of railroad that does not mean to have shipping of its own, not, perhaps, to be held in the name of the railroad company, but to be in friendly hands, so that the company can make its rates across the water to correspond with what it thinks are to its interest on land.

Mr. President, I want to commend to the Senators who are talking about this question an article in the Statist, an English paper of great merit and high authority, dealing with this question of shipbuilding in the world and in the United States. After dealing with the subject somewhat generally, the editorial says:

Yet it must be admitted that the advance made by the United States is very striking. The American output comprises 10 sailing vessels, aggregating 12,303 tons, and 118 steamers, aggregating 266,799 tons.

The item regarding the 118 steamers is intended to give the aggregate of that class of vessels, and the reference to sailing vessels is intended to give what they call not the aggregate of all but the average. Then the details are given in a long article. I do not intend to read it, but I want to call attention to what is said about these big ships:

But the work completed last year by American builders is nothing to the work they have on hand—

This is from the Statist of March 1, 1902—

Thus the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, New London, Conn., are to build 4 steamers of 21,000 tons, and 10,000 horsepower each, for the Great Northern Steamship Company—a total of 84,000 tons in one yard.

Then it gives the business of Newport yards, and so on.

Mr. President, I intended to give some further quotations from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation as to the propriety of our being allowed to buy ships; but as I understand a number of other Senators desire to speak, I will not spend the time to do it.

This is our condition: We have a very large tonnage, but, of course, that tonnage is largely what is called domestic; and yet it would be foreign if we were situated like some of the other countries of the world. The ship that crosses the English Channel to France, a mere step, is engaged in foreign trade when it enters a French port or a German port. But the ship that leaves New York and goes to Galveston, or Boston, or Portland, or some other port in the United States is engaged in the coastwise trade.

Senators seem to think that the ocean coastwise and the lake trade are not matters of any consequence; that we have got no commerce because we have not got it on the great Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Mr. President, we have got, with one exception, the greatest commerce in the world. True, it is the ocean coastwise trade and the lake trade, but it is just as much commerce as it is when a ship leaves the city of New York and goes to Liverpool or Southampton. The distance covered by a ship in the domestic trade is oftentimes as great as that covered by ships in the foreign trade; and if you take the trade on the Pacific coast, for instance, between San Francisco or San Diego and points on the Alaskan coast, the distance is greater than that which would be traversed in the foreign trade; and yet it is domestic commerce and does not figure, and so it is lost sight of by the Senators who insist that the great crying want now is ocean commerce—trade with some foreign country.

Of course, we have got a very large trade on the ocean, excelled only by Great Britain, and we have had it carried very largely, I will admit, in foreign ships. Why? Because they have been able to carry it by reason of the fact that they had built the ships. We have not built them, and why have we not built them? Mr. President, we have been building railroads and we have been doing a thousand other things that have employed American capital to better advantage than it could be employed in ships. In England they have had no opportunity to put their millions and hundreds of millions of dollars into railroads. But in our own country, in what was the unknown West, within forty years we have built 80,000 miles of as good railroads as the world has ever seen. West of the Mississippi River, where, when I first made my acquaintance with that country, there was not a single mile of railroad, to-day the railroads there represent an expenditure of millions and millions of dollars of American money; and there has been no more profitable investment than these great continental lines and their local connections. They are to-day returning to the men who own them an income greater than the whole national income was when I was born. They are declaring great dividends upon their earnings. That is why we have not been building ships.

We have probably gotten to the end of our efforts in building railroads, and the money which will now naturally go into ships, and has already commenced going into ships, will put us in time on an equal footing with the rest of the world. We have built the best railroads in the world, and I will state now, Mr. President, what it gives me great pleasure to state, that we have demonstrated how to run railroads as no other people in the world have been able to do, and recently the great railroads of Europe have sent commissions over here to see how it is that we are able to carry such tremendous loads.

Mr. President, I can recall when a car on any of the first-class roads carried 10 tons of freight. It was regarded as large a load as any car ought to carry. What do they carry now? We have quadrupled it, and more than that, and England to-day is substituting the great American car for her small car, and they are predicting an increased profit. The locomotive we ran on a first-class train forty years ago would not be used in a coal yard now, and the trains we haul now are four or five times as large as they were in those days. We have put great sums, as the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] told us the other day, into railroads, and if you let this industry alone and deal fairly with the shipowners, then we will in time have a ship-owning class in the United States equal to what is demanded of us. If the foreign ship can carry freight cheaper than we can, it is going to carry it. I submit if there is any vice in our conditions, if there is any reason why we can not build ships as cheaply and operate them as cheaply as foreigners can with ships built in Europe or manned with European seamen, then as a business proposition we have to get out of the business.

I have figured a little upon this proposition, and I do not believe when you pay the bounties which you propose to pay you will put the American shipowner and the European shipowner on an equality, if the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Ohio are correct in their statements of the cost of construction and the cost of maintenance and the cost of operation. I do not agree to that, though. But if they are right about it, then they must devise some other and some better method, and the only method they can devise upon this line that I see is to increase the bounty, which we will have an opportunity to do whenever the shipowners start their ships and come to us and say: "We still can not compete."

Mr. President, if we will let this alone, I believe we will be all right. I do not believe the conditions are as Senators believe. If I did believe that they were, I would despair of any great improvement in this direction for some time to come. I do not believe it. I believe this great commerce of ours, these extraordinary exports we are sending out, which are to increase, in my judgment, and not decrease, will constitute an inducement for American money to go into American ships, and I think if we are really anxious and really desirous of improving the condition the wise thing to do would be to say to every American shipowner, "If you wish to engage in the Atlantic or the Pacific trade, the ocean trade, not the coastwise trade, go and buy your ship where you can buy it cheapest and bring it here and it shall be documented as an American ship."

I believe that might help us some, because then they would not be compelled to wait two or three or five years for the ships to be built, for the great concerns in Europe are building ships all the time and looking for purchasers for them, which no American shipyard has done, because it did not need to do it; it had the work without doing it; it had the orders, and there was no necessity for it to engage in the speculation of building ships and waiting for a customer, as many of the foreign yards have been obliged to do.

I have here resolutions of a labor organization, which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURTON in the chair). Without objection, the resolutions will be inserted in the RECORD.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

OFFICE OF RECORDING SECRETARY,
ORDER OF KNIGHTS OF LABOR, D. A. 66,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1902.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: At a regular meeting of District Assembly 66 of the Knights of Labor, representing all the assemblies in the District of Columbia, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a bill known as S. 1348 for the granting of ship subsidies; and

Whereas this subsidy, if granted, will simply amount to a gift of many millions of dollars annually of the taxes taken from the wealth producers of the country to a small coterie of enormously wealthy individuals and corporations: and

Whereas many of the men and corporations to whom it is proposed to grant this subsidy are engaged in criminal violations of the interstate-commerce and antitrust laws of the United States; and

Whereas no possible benefit can possibly come to labor, and much injury to the masses of the people will result from the enactment of this subsidy law, which is simply class legislation for the enrichment of a few trusts and corporations at the expense of the laborers, farmers, and legitimate business men: Therefore,

Resolved, That District Assembly 66, Knights of Labor, hereby renew our protest of last year against this subsidy legislation, and we earnestly call upon all friends of honest labor and honest government to defeat the enactment of the Frye subsidy bill or any similar class legislation; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States.

THOS. P. O'DEA,
District Master Workman.
WM. L. DEWART,
District Secretary District Assembly 66, Knights of Labor.

Mr. HANNA obtained the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HANNA. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I have in my hand a memorandum prepared for the Chinese-exclusion commission of the State of California, apropos of the proposal of the International Seamen's Union of America, of the American Federation of Labor, and the Chinese-exclusion commission of California, that vessels under the American flag should not be permitted to employ in their crews Chinese persons not entitled to admission to the United States. I ask for the information of the Senate that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the Senator have it printed as a separate document, and then it will be more accessible.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should prefer that. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a Senate document for the information of Senators before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as well as others who have spoken upon the other side of this question have made the statement that our shipyards are entirely filled up with work and are likely to be for some time to come. He read from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation as to the amount of tonnage constructed and in process of construction to show that the present condition of shipbuilding in this country is better than it ever has been before, and I entirely agree with that proposition.

But with reference to the future, I have some figures from the Treasury Department which are probably up to date.

Mr. TELLER. From the Commissioner of Navigation?

Mr. HANNA. Yes; from the Commissioner of Navigation. By the way, it is strange how much is said about the Commissioner of Navigation in this discussion, because, forsooth, in the course of experience he has changed his opinions upon certain questions relating to our merchant marine, and now entertains opinions which seem to differ from those which he expressed in his earlier report, when he came fresh from the stronghold of Democracy, having absorbed in his youth and inexperience certain ideas. But as he was led to investigate the question and became familiar with the facts and studied the proposition, he was forced to the same conclusion that many others had arrived at earlier from their experience in reference to this question.

I think nearly every member of the Senate upon the other side who has spoken on this subject has alluded to that fact, rather holding up to ridicule and sarcasm the reports of the Commissioner of Navigation. I get information from that Bureau simply because, so far as I know, it is the only authorized medium through which such information can come from the statistical department of the Government.

This report says that during the month of January, in reply I have no doubt to a question, the following shipbuilding concerns reported to the Bureau of Navigation, Treasury Department, that they had no new contracts or new work in hand beyond work reported in June, 1901, and set forth in detail in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, pages 147 to 154, inclusive: Newport News Shipbuilding Company, Newport News, Va.; Union Iron Works, San Francisco, Cal.; New York Shipbuilding Company, Camden, N. J.; Moran Brothers, Seattle, Wash.; Eastern Shipbuilding Company, Groton, Conn.; Maryland Steel Works, Sparrows Point, Md.; Neafie & Levy, Philadelphia, Pa.; John H. Dialogue, Camden, N. J., and Spedden Shipbuilding Company, Baltimore, Md.

The Cramp Shipbuilding Company reported a contract for building 1 oil-tank steamer, 3,500 tons, for the coasting trade.

The Trigg Shipbuilding Company, 1 tank steamer of the same description, and 1 small tug.

T. S. Marvel, Newburgh, N. Y., 1 ferryboat.

Roach's Yard, Chester, Pa., 1 local freight boat, of about 450 tons.

Harlan & Hollingsworth, 1 yacht, 1 ferryboat, 1 side-wheeler.

Risdon Iron Works, 1 steel towboat.

Bath Iron Works, 1 oil barge.

Pusey & Jones, 3 small vessels, each under 300 tons.

Burley Dry Dock, Staten Island, 1 oil barge and 1 tug.

Arthur Sewall Company, Bath, Me., 1 oil barge and 1 steel schooner.

The same concerns had, in the meantime, launched and brought to a greater or less extent near completion (some vessels being in operation at the present time), 19 vessels, aggregating 99,000 tons.

I subscribe to the declaration that our shipyards have been busier in the last year or two than ever before in our history, but they have been busy in the construction of vessels for the coastwise trade almost exclusively.

The statement has been made in the course of this debate that six or eight or possibly ten vessels for the foreign trade have been under construction at Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Newport News, a part of them by the American Transport Company, two of them by the American Line, so called—the International Navigation Company, and one or two vessels for the Spreckels Line from California to Australia. It has been stated that the reason why those vessels were put under construction is that it was anticipated that something would be done by the American Congress to help to build up the American merchant marine; and, as a Senator on the other side stated—and perhaps we will put it in that way—they were willing to gamble upon that prospect, and gave orders to have the ships built in this country. But the statement is made to-day that unless the privileges embodied in this bill are extended to those ships they will be operated under foreign flags, for the reasons, which have been stated, that they can not afford to run them under the American flag or under American register.

While the difference in cost between ships built on the other side and on this side of the Atlantic is great, it is the smallest part of this proposition, because the life of an iron or steel steamer, it would not be an exaggeration to say, is fifty to a hundred years, and if the difference in cost is charged off at the rate of 5 or 10 per cent every year you would soon eliminate it. But during those fifty or a hundred years, if the vessel is afloat and is operated, the difference in the cost of operation is going to make the investment an unprofitable one.

Now, with reference to the Great Lakes——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me, before he passes from that point, to ask a question for information?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the Senator to contend, and it is probably true, so far as I know, that the difference in cost of construction between this country and abroad is 25 per cent, and that the difference in cost of operation is from 30 to 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. HANNA. I have said from 25 to 30 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. Twenty-five to 30 per cent. It is about the same now as it was at the last session, when we had the debate on the other bill?

Mr. HANNA. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. At the last session, when the former bill was pending, the Senator stated, and the Senator from Maine stated, as I recollect it, that the subsidies provided for by that bill were simply adequate, and no more, to overcome the adverse conditions with respect to the cost of construction and operation. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. HANNA. I would not undertake to reply without referring to the language I used. Perhaps the Senator has it before him.

Mr. SPOONER. That the rates prescribed by the other bill were not more than adequate to overcome the adverse conditions.

Mr. HANNA. I will admit the proposition that the subsidies proposed were intended to overcome the difference between the cost of construction and operation in this country and abroad.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator must have been of the opinion that they did that.

Mr. HANNA. Yes; as far as possible.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, the subsidies provided in the pending bill are confessedly less, are they not, than those provided in what is called the Hanna-Payne bill?

Mr. HANNA. Confessedly less? Do you ask me if the subsidies are confessedly less?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HANNA. I believe it has been demonstrated and figured out accurately that the subsidies in this bill are less than in the bill which originally passed the Senate in 1891.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, that I know. That has been demonstrated.

Mr. HANNA. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Commissioner of Navigation reports, and it was stated by the Senator from Maine, and I thought stated by the Senator from Ohio, although I do not assert it, that the rates of mail pay and the general subsidy provided for in this bill are less, considerably less, although the Senator from Maine did not know just how much, than the rates of subsidy prescribed by the Hanna-Payne bill.

Mr. HANNA. I have not made any such statement.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not said the Senator did. I said I thought so.

Mr. HANNA. The difference between this bill and the bill of 1901 is that in the former bill the subsidy was paid on speed allowance and mileage, and this is on tonnage.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator contend, then, that the rates provided for by this bill are as high as those provided for by the last bill?

Mr. HANNA. It is on an entirely different basis. I would not answer the question without having made the figures.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed the Senator had made the figures.

Mr. HANNA. I will take the opportunity to reply to the Senator when I get those figures.

Mr. SPOONER. My point is this: As the Senator will see, if they are less, and the others were simply adequate, this bill, if passed, would not overcome the adverse conditions and put our ships on an equality with foreign competitors.

Mr. HANNA. To figure it down as fine as that, the difference is so slight that I do not care to discuss it as an argument pro or con in connection with this proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. All right.

Mr. HANNA. I simply rose—not intending to take up the time of the Senate—to answer the argument of the Senator from Colorado in reference to the present conditions of this industry.

Passing to the Great Lakes, the greatest development in this country has been there, and it has been there because of the growing commerce from the Northwest and particularly from the mineral districts. There were shipped from the mines of Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin last year 20,000,000 tons of iron ore to be manufactured into steel and iron. Besides that, the growing tonnage of our steel production causes an increased demand every year for a larger fleet, and, as I have said before, within my experience upon those lakes as interested in lake transportation, I have seen vessels grow from little wooden schooners of 500 tons to steel steamers to-day of 7,000 tons carrying capacity. It is the development of that industry which has created the demand for shipbuilding upon the lakes, so that every shipyard in the whole chain of lakes is busy to-day and will be busy all this year.

But that industry is protected by our coastwise laws, and it creates a demand for American ships. A very large amount of that iron ore goes into the manufacture of steel for the construction of ships, and that is part of my argument in this whole proposition. It is one contributing part toward the building up of this industry. If it requires iron ore to make steel, then it requires iron ore to build ships, and the carrying of the iron ore makes a demand for more ships upon the Great Lakes.

Whatever may have been the incentive to construct these eight or ten ships for the foreign trade during the last year, it is a fact that no more ships have been contracted for in any of the shipyards enumerated in this report for 1902, except a few tugs, a few oil-tank ships, two or three ferryboats, and vessels for the United States Navy. These are the only contracts in sight, and so far as I know the only contracts likely to be in sight for construction in any of these shipyards, unless there is an incentive given which will induce capital to invest in the industry.

Mr. ELKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Ohio, that the works on the lakes were very large. Of the 585 vessels constructed last year, 257, with a gross tonnage of 602,860, were built for the lakes, or about six-tenths of the whole was for the lakes and four-tenths for the seaboard.

Mr. HANNA. But, as I understand it, when you say the seaboard it means the coastwise trade.

Mr. TELLER. Most of it is for the coastwise trade, but not all of it. But I think that the Senator does not distinguish when he says we are building ships, that we are building just as good ships for the coastwise trade as anybody builds for the Atlantic or the Pacific trade.

[Mr. ELKINS addressed the Senate. His speech will appear hereafter.]

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3267) to change the boundaries between the southern and central judicial districts of the Indian Territory, which was on page 1, line 4, to strike out all after the word "the," where it first occurs, down to and including "Territory," in line 10, and insert:

junction of Island Bayou and the Red River, up the Red River to the mouth of the Washita River, and up said river to the mouth of Butcherpen Creek, and north up said Butcherpen Creek to the township line between townships 4 and 5 south, in range 7 east, thence along said township line to the boundary line between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, in range 8 east, shall be added to the central judicial district of the Indian Territory.

Mr. HOAR. That amendment adopted by the House is merely a slight change in the description of the territory, which is to be set off from one district to another, and it was adopted in the House on the recommendation of the Department of Justice. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

LOAN OF TENTS TO THE TEXAS REUNION ASSOCIATION.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 161) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Texas Reunion Association was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs authorized me to report a similar joint resolution, which is on the Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is Order of Business 721 on the Calendar, Senate joint resolution No. 64.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is exactly the same as the House joint resolution. I have not compared them.

Mr. CULBERSON. As stated by the Senator from Missouri, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs have reported a similar joint resolution, word for word, favorably. I ask that the House joint resolution be put upon its passage and that Senate joint resolution No. 64, now on the Calendar, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the officers of the Texas Reunion Association such number of tents, poles, and pins as may be necessary for the accommodation of the Confederate reunion to be held at the city of Dallas, Tex., April 22 to April 25, 1902: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from such officers a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition; and the whole without expense to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business No. 721, being Senate joint resolution No. 64, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Texas Reunion Association will be indefinitely postponed.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT SAVANNAH, GA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 1980) to establish a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga., which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CLAY. The Senate one day last week passed a Senate bill for this purpose, and sent it to the House. I ask that the vote by which the bill (S. 1545) to establish a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga., was passed be reconsidered, and that the House be requested to return the bill, and that it be indefinitely postponed. Then I ask that this bill may be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill indicated by him, and that it be recalled from the House of Representatives. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Georgia now asks for the present consideration of House bill 1980, it being the same as the Senate bill which was passed a few days ago. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase such land (or to use such land of the Government as may not be otherwise needed by the Government, or exchange or sell the same to purchase a suitable site) and to erect thereon such buildings as, in the opinion of the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, shall be necessary for a marine hospital at Savannah, Ga.

SEC. 2. That the limit of cost shall not exceed $150,000 inclusive of the site, or $125,000 exclusive of the site.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT KEEPER'S DWELLING AT CALUMET HARBOR, ILLINOIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7675) to construct a light-house keeper's dwelling at Calumet Harbor, and asking a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. CLAY were appointed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I submit an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to the pending bill, which I ask may be read for information, and that it may be printed. Then I will ask leave to submit a word or two on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 1 as a part thereof the following proviso:

Provided, That no contract made under the provisions of this act shall be binding upon the Government of the United States until the same shall have been submitted to and approved by Congress.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have been led to offer that amendment by something I heard said in the Senate by the honorable senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in a colloquy which he had upon the floor of the Senate with the present occupant of the chair [Mr. FRYE].

I think it is an exceedingly serious proposition that this unlimited power to contract should be given to the Postmaster-General, and that, as expressed by the Senator from Iowa upon that occasion, Congress should thereafter have no further control over the matter. I ought to say that the question has been immediately brought to my recollection by what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on yesterday said in speaking on this bill.

As I previously said, I do not profess to have very thorough knowledge as to the postal service, because I am not on any of the committees which call upon me to make a very minute investigation relative thereto, but upon inquiry I learn that there is no such latitude now allowed as to any contract made by the Postmaster-General concerning the land mail service. I think possibly four years is the outside limit of a contract which the Postmaster-General has the authority to make for the carriage of the mails on the land. This bill in the provision which gives the Postmaster-General a right at his discretion, in unlimited amounts and in unlimited service, extending over the whole world, to make contracts which are not to be less than five nor more than fifteen years, is certainly putting an immense responsibility and an immense power in the hands of that officer.

The Senator from Iowa, in speaking on this matter, made a suggestion which implies the fact that the passage of this bill practically takes out of the hands of Congress any control of this subject so long as one of these pending contracts may last. As expressed by him, it will result simply in one department of the executive branch of the Government drawing a warrant on another department of the executive branch of the Government, while the legislative department, which ought to control in all those matters—whether it does control the minute details or not, ought to have the thing sufficiently in hand always to be able to correct anything which may be found to be wrong, and also to give such directions as may be, in the opinion of the legislative branch, most conducive to the public service—the legislative branch will, as the bill now stands, have practically surrendered all control of it.

Mr. President, I presume that Senators who favor this bill will say that they regard contracts for many millions of dollars, when once made by the Postmaster-General for fifteen years, to be inviolable; that the parties with whom the contracts have been made will have gone forward in good faith upon the basis of those contracts in the expenditure of large sums of money in the construction of ships, and that it would be violative of good faith on the part of the Government thereafter to cut off one of these contracts before the expiration of the time. Of course, I do not see any answer to that. It is practically consenting, so far as we can consent, that future Congresses shall be bound, not one particular Congress, but all Congresses within fifteen years, by the legislation which we now enact virtually depriving them of any moral right, at least, to repeal it.

In that connection, Mr. President, there is another thought, which was also suggested by what the Senator from Iowa said, and that is, that there is nothing in this bill which will secure the development of trade in the particular direction where it is most needed and where there will result to us the most benefit in such development. For this reason I wish to provide by this amendment for approval of the contracts, so that contracts will be made for the establishment of new routes where it is especially desirable to develop our trade. For instance, the Senator from Iowa alluded to the trade between the United States and South America. While it is contemplated, as suggested in the report of the committee, there is nothing in this bill which will secure the development of such trade, and the colloquy which I had with the distinguished Senator from Ohio on yesterday indicated that it is not probable that there will be any such development.

I was speaking yesterday of the fact that the contracts would be made by parties who would be looking after their own interests, and who would naturally seek contracts which would be the most remunerative to them. We can all see at once that the contracts which would be the most remunerative to them would be the contracts between New York or Philadelphia or Boston and the great commercial seaports of Europe; and in reference to that the Senator from Ohio asked me whether or not I would favor such increase in the subsidy for lines which were to be engaged in the South American trade as would be an inducement to these parties not to confine their contracts to the European trade, but to divert them to the South American trade. The honorable Senator, I should conclude, plainly thereby indicated his opinion that there would be less inducement to parties under this bill to enter into contracts for the running of steamship lines between the United States and South America, and that they would naturally go in the direction where there was a greater promise of pecuniary reward to them, which would be the direction I have indicated.

Mr. HANNA. If I may interrupt the Senator, do I understand him to say that I made that statement?

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether the Senator correctly understood my statement or not. He was conversing during a part of the time I was speaking, but I certainly understood him to make the statement as I have made it to-day. If I am in error, I shall be glad to be corrected by the honorable Senator. I will repeat it, in order that I may not be misunderstood by him.

I had said, Mr. President, that when on the floor yesterday, in making an inquiry, I had engaged in a short colloquy with the Senator from Ohio and I had suggested the fact that, under this bill, the contracts which would be made would be the contracts which would cover the routes which were the most remunerative, and that none of them would be made with South America.

The Senator from Ohio asked me the question, if I recollect correctly, whether I would be willing to increase the subsidy which would relate to the establishment of lines between the United States and South America in order to effect that result. That is all I quoted the Senator as saying. I then said that the conclusion drawn from that inquiry was that—not that the Senator said it—but that the conclusion drawn from that inquiry was that there would be less inducement to establish lines between the United States and South America, because there would be less remuneration, or the promise of less pecuniary reward, and that, therefore, a larger subsidy would be needed for those particular routes in order to secure the establishment of those lines. Now, if I misrepresent the Senator in that, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. HANNA. My objection is that the Senator should draw his conclusions of what was in my mind. I had no such idea at all.

Mr. BACON. That may all be so; but I quoted what the Senator said, and I said that the question——

Mr. HANNA. The Senator may draw his own conclusions from what I have said, but I am not bound to adopt them.

Mr. BACON. Certainly not; but I draw my own conclusions. I do not say that the Senator must adopt my conclusions, but I say when the Senator makes an inquiry of that kind, that conclusion is the one naturally to follow. I certainly thought the Senator had that conclusion in his mind. I see no escape from that conclusion, because, unless that conclusion is justifiable, there would be no point that I could see in the inquiry of the Senator, whether I would favor an increased subsidy to secure the establishment of lines going to that particular region.

In that connection, Mr. President, I want to say another word, which I was about to say when the Senator made the inquiry of me. The term "subsidy" has no special terror for me, and if the Senator had a bill here, or, I should say, if there was a bill pending in the Senate, which proposed to give an increased compensation for the carrying of the mails between the United States and South American ports, for instance, greater than would be paid under ordinary circumstances in order to induce the establishment of lines that would open to us that valuable trade, an increase definite and reasonable, I would not hesitate to support such a bill. It may be that some of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber would not agree with me in that particular. I am, however, opposed to bonuses which do not have that effect, and do not have that purpose, but which are intended—I say "intended," but I will change that word as it may not be understood in the way in which I use it—the effect of which will be to give compensation to those who do not need it, and the effect of which will not be to accomplish the great purpose which I think we should have in view, if such a bill is to be passed, which is to build up trade where it does not now exist.

There is no trouble, Mr. President, about trade between the United States and Europe or the carriage of freight that we have to send or to receive, and in that connection I want to call the Senate's attention to one fact in connection with the statement made here that the great English lines have been bought by Americans. Really the strongest argument against foreign ships carrying our freight is the fact that the hundreds of millions of dollars paid out for the carriage of that freight goes into the pockets of foreigners, but if those ships are owned in America that argument no longer lasts, and the hundreds of millions of dollars which have heretofore gone into English pockets, if the ships have been bought by Americans, will now go into American pockets, and there is no longer that reason for the proposed subsidy; and this is not affected by the fact that the ships purchased are under the British flag.

Mr. President, the object and purpose I had in asking the indulgence of the Senate at this time was to secure permission to put in the RECORD some very valuable tables which have been prepared, and which I think are illustrative of the character of this bill. I have not myself prepared these tables. I am not skilled in that line, even if I had the time; but they have been prepared by an able statistician, and they are prepared from records. Of course, if they are inaccurate, that inaccuracy can easily be detected.

One of the arguments against the pending ship-subsidy bill and one of the most glaring of its fundamentally unjust features is that the great bulk of the pecuniary benefits derived from it would be secured by a few of the existing fast mail and passenger steamers and their owners, and that the benefits derived by the freight-carrying boats would be comparatively insignificant. I have here the figures showing the large amount and the large proportion of the whole amount which will be received by the existing fast boats. They are easily ascertainable, and have been stated in the Senate and elsewhere repeatedly, not only in this debate, but in the press and otherwise.

The figures of the amounts that will probably be secured by the slow freight boats are not so easily ascertainable, because the number and the tonnage of these boats and the number of miles which they travel in a year can not be computed as closely as in the case of mail steamers, but for the purpose of assisting in the procurement of accurate information in regard to the figures under the general subsidy title I submit a list of the vessels carrying exports from all ports of the United States to foreign countries during certain periods of the year 1900, together with the tonnage and speed of the vessels and the nature and value of their cargoes.

I desire, however, to have a few specimens of these statistics inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks, and for this purpose I submit the statistics of five representative ports of the United States in different sections of the country, namely, Boston, New York, Savannah, Galveston, and San Francisco. The main point to be derived from them is that the great bulk of foreign exports hitherto has gone out of the country in small and very slow boats, of which only a very small number, probably not more than 1 per cent, would be available for mail subsidy under the bill. The list will show an astonishingly large number of small craft, including many of less than 1,000 tons burden, which therefore will be unavailable for any of the subsidy under the bill.

Mr. President, I will say that anyone who will look at these tables will be surprised at the fact which I have just stated as to the very large amount of our export trade that is carried out in ships under 1,000 tons burden, and almost all of it, comparatively speaking, in vessels of not over 14 knots per hour.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. It is quite important that we should know who is the author of these tables, as the Senator himself disclaims the authorship, and I ask whether they were prepared in the Treasury Department, where they could be verified?

Mr. BACON. No, they were not; but I am going to have them printed, and the Senator can verify them if he wishes. I have not verified them myself, and so stated in the beginning. I believe, however, that they are correct. I will state to the Senator that I will give him the character of the tables, in order that he may judge.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator pleases, as to the tables which several of us have furnished, we have given the authority for them when we were not able to vouch for them ourselves. If the Senator from Georgia himself vouches for these tables as being correct, it would be perhaps impertinent or improper on my part to ask for the name of the author of them; but as they will go into the official RECORD and will be referred to hereafter, it is only proper that we should have the Senator from Georgia vouch for them or verify them or give us the name of the author.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will vouch for them to the extent that I will say that I have not any doubt whatever as to their entire accuracy. I will give the Senator, in order that he may not be unduly concerned before he has an opportunity to see for himself the character of these tables, the assurance that they are not calculations of an obscure character, where figures are sometimes made to lie, but they are simply statements giving the name of the vessels, the tonnage, the speed, and, in the particular table I have before me, which relates to the carriage of wheat, the number of barrels and the value of the cargo, all of which is, of course, as the Senator knows much better than the remainder of us, obtained from records which are accessible to all, and where falsification of them could bring nothing but disgrace on the man who should attempt it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is there a statement there as to the time within which these cargoes have left?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to know, because there should be some limitation as to the time and the location.

Mr. BACON. There is. The heading of this particular table I have before me, for instance, reads in this way:

Table showing the amount and value of flour exported from Boston, Mass., by the different vessels engaged in the foreign trade from that port for the ten months ending October 31, 1900. (When speed is not stated, it is below 12 knots.)

That is the heading of the table. Then begins the names of the ships, beginning with the Alecto, and giving the tonnage, speed, cargo, and value.

I will state that the ships are arranged not with reference to the date of sailing, but are arranged alphabetically for convenience, and they are all within that period of ten months ending October 31, 1900.

Mr. TILLMAN. So that they can be verified by consulting the records in the custom-house at Boston?

Mr. BACON. Yes. The first one is the ship Alecto; gross tonnage, 3,607 tons; speed, 13½ knots; barrels of flour, 34,690; value, $125,716, and so on through, giving the name of every ship that is cleared from Boston during those ten months carrying these particular articles of trade.

The simplicity of the statements, reciting the name of the ship, her tonnage, her speed, what her cargo consisted of, and the value of it—I say the simplicity of those items, not involved in any occult or obscure calculation—makes the verification of them of the simplest and easiest character.

Mr. KEAN. Why can not the Senator from Georgia verify it by giving the source of his information?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, suppose the Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator here should pause to give the source of his information in every case. It is an entirely respectable source, however, and I will vouch for it. To that extent the Senator need not be afraid of it; and why should the Senators be so disturbed? They will probably be disturbed when they see the tables.

Mr. KEAN. I want to have the Senator accurate in his statement. I presume he has authority for it.

Mr. BACON. In the port of Boston there are the official records which will prove the truth of each one of these statements, and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I have not the least doubt of their accuracy. I state that in my place as a Senator. Does the Senator want more?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would again state what is included in those tables. Do they refer to American ships only or to all ships?

Mr. BACON. All ships.

Mr. ALLISON. Sail and steam?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir, all ships; and they show the amounts of these particular articles of production in this country—flour, corn, wheat, and other things—the purpose of the tables being to show the fact that the large bulk, almost the entire bulk, of these great products of this country are carried in slow vessels, almost all of them vessels under 14 knots in speed, and a very large proportion of these products is carried in small vessels under 1,000 tons, which would not receive any benefit from this bill if they were all American vessels. Now, certainly that is a most important fact to be shown. Of course, it is impracticable for me to read, though if Senators desire it I will not shirk the task of reading this entire list before it is printed.

Mr. KEAN. Oh, well, if the Senator will not verify what he states there is no use of his reading it.

Mr. BACON. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the Senator.

Mr. KEAN. I only said, of course if the Senator did not wish to verify the list it is not necessary to read it.

Mr. BACON. I have sufficiently informed myself to have no doubt as to the accuracy of the list, and I have stated that fact in my place as a Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to say that vessels such as are described in that paper would not receive any benefit under this bill.

Mr. BACON. A very large proportion of them would not, if they were American vessels.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, I submit to the Senator that under title 2 any vessel that can sail on the ocean and reach a foreign port would get a subsidy under that schedule.

Mr. BACON. That is true; but there is a limitation here of a thousand tons.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to say the other day, in answer to an interrogatory of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that he would find by the bill that vessels of less than a thousand tons would get no subsidy. I so understood him.

Mr. BACON. That was my understanding.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Iowa says it is not in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Maine was mistaken in that statement.

Mr. BERRY. All vessels, then, get the subsidy, without regard to their tonnage?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, there is a gradation of ships according to the different classes, and, of course, when I said that certain vessels would get no subsidy, possibly, under the present announcement the statement would be inaccurate, but it would be true that the benefits received would be very much minimized by the fact of the smaller class of ships doing a very large part of this trade. They might receive the subsidy under title 2.

Mr. CLAY. They would not receive it under the provisions in regard to mail pay.

Mr. BACON. That is the part of the bill I have before me now. They would not receive it under the first title, because that is limited, as I understand it, to vessels of 14 knots and over. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. BACON. It is limited to vessels of 14 knots and over.

Mr. President, it is a fact that almost the entire freight for transportation abroad is carried by ships which would be excluded from the benefits of this bill under the first title, because almost every one of them is under 14 knots and under 2,000 tons. I will not say that almost every one of them is under 2,000 tons, but a very large proportion of them are under 2,000 tons.

In this connection I desire to call attention, without going through an analysis of these various tables, to just one fact with reference to the ports of Boston, Galveston, and Savannah. The statistics of shipping for the port of Boston show that for the ten months ending October 31, 1900, among 55 steamers carrying wheat from that port to foreign ports, with cargoes valued at more than $6,000,000, only 5 out of the 55 were of 14 knots or over. From Galveston, out of 213 vessels, only 1 was of 14 knots; and from Savannah, out of 103 vessels, not a single one had a speed of 14 knots.

Those ships are evidently constructed with reference to the economical carriage of freight. They constitute, I have no doubt, the great fleet of tramps, which are the cheap freight-carrying vessels of the world, and in order to compete with them we must have vessels of a similar class, and the point of these tables is to show—not with reference to title 2, but with reference to title 1—that the great bulk of the freight that is exported from this country is exported in vessels of a class which would not get a penny under the first title of this bill, and that all of this vast sum of money, which the Senator from Maine stated after five years would amount to $4,700,000 in one year, is to go to a few favored large, fast mail steamship lines, which at last will not carry the great commerce of the country.

Now these tables will show that if all of these ships now carrying the great products of this country from American ports to foreign ports were under American registry and otherwise entitled to make contracts, their size and speed would exclude them all from the benefits of this bill. I ask leave to insert these tables in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The tables referred to are as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution, transmitting to the Senate the message of the President and the bill (H. R. 5224) for the relief of Edward Kershner, with the request that the Senate reconsider its action in passing the bill, in order that an amendment may be made to the bill by striking out the word "director" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "inspector."

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SOUTH OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4607) to provide for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at or near South Omaha, Nebr.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 3, line 19, section 3, after the words "Secretary of War," to insert:

And said structure shall be changed at the cost and expense of the owners thereof from time to time as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, as no one else seems desirous of taking the floor on the pending bill at the present moment, I wish to submit a few objections which I have to the bill as it stands. I do so with some hesitation, for the reason that I have been trying for some days to ascertain exactly what this bill proposes to do and how far it differs from the bill that was considered here a year ago, and I must confess that I have had some difficulty, and that difficulty does not diminish as the debate progresses.

I had the impression in the early stages of the debate that this bill was a tentative measure, rather, and that it was not so comprehensive in its scope as the bill we discussed last year. I was told, and am told now, that this bill is very much better than the bill we debated so long last year. That may be true in some particulars. I remember that my friend the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] stated to me only a few days ago that this was a bill greatly improving the bill of last year.

This morning, in response to an inquiry from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], we have been told by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] that it is not possible to state with any degree of accuracy the difference between this bill and the bill we considered last year as respects the amount of subsidy. I use that term because it is in common use in the Chamber in discussing the pending measure.

Mr. BACON. The term is used in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. The Senator from Ohio said it is not possible to state the difference between the subsidy of this bill and that of the bill we had up a year ago. I have been trying to ascertain whether there is a difference, but in response to the inquiry made by the Senator from Wisconsin the Senator from Ohio does not venture an opinion upon that subject.

I have also been trying to ascertain the scope of this bill as compared with the one of a year ago, and I find in many particulars that the bills are widely divergent. The bill of one year ago provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should make contracts with steamships and sailing vessels for the purpose of navigating the ocean, and those contracts were to be based upon speed and tonnage. I find in this bill that the Secretary of the Treasury makes no contracts whatever; that the contracts which are to be made are to be made by the Postmaster-General, and in his judgment and discretion.

The bill we had under consideration then limited the terms of its continuance to twenty years as respects contracts. No contract could be made after twenty years from the passage of the bill. But under the pending bill there is no limit to the time when contracts can be made. This bill goes on and on until such time as Congress may alter, amend, or repeal it, and even that authority is not expressly reserved in the bill as I think it ought to be, and I hope some Senator will offer an amendment to that end. I think it ought to have a beginning and an ending.

Therefore I shall propose to amend the bill in that particular in its first section, on page 1, section 1, line 10, so as to read:

The Postmaster-General, until the 1st day of July, 1910, is hereby authorized and directed to enter into contracts for a term not less than five nor more than fifteen years, etc.

I do not propose to offer an amendment to shorten directly the period of fifteen years, although that is an extension of five years beyond the present law of 1891.

I also desire to offer an amendment to that section on page 2 after line 13 by inserting:

Provided, That no contract shall be made under the provisions of this title which shall extend beyond the 1st day of July, 1920.

The scope of that will be that whatever contracts are made by the Postmaster-General after three years from July 1, 1902, will be made for such period as will terminate the contract in 1920.

In other words, after 1905 the period of a contract shall be diminished as time goes on, so that when 1910 arrives the contract can be made for only ten years, the period of the act of 1891, which is amended by this bill and to which my amendment will be an amendment. I explain these amendments and their scope in brief for the reason that under our agreement if they are not explained now there will be no opportunity of debating them on Monday..

I stated a while ago that this bill differs in many respects from the bill of a year ago. I have scanned this bill with a view to ascertain the character of the vessels that are to be employed in the mail service. Under title 2 of the bill there is an inhibition as against vessels that are not classified as A1 in the various associations. But I find in this bill that vessels—shall, before they are accepted for the mail service herein provided for, be thoroughly inspected by a competent naval officer or constructor detailed for that service by the Secretary of the Navy; and such officers shall report, in writing, to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall transmit said report to the Postmaster-General; and no such vessel not approved by the Secretary of the Navy as suitable for the service required shall be employed by the Postmaster-General as provided for in this act.

There is no other requirement, as I understand this bill, and if I overlooked a requirement as respects the mail ships I shall be glad to be corrected.

This was not true of the bill of a year ago. There were in it very strict and careful provisions as to the character of the fast steamships, because under the bill of a year ago, although they were not then designated as mail ships, they were fast steamships; and in that bill the committee reported an amendment which I think a wise and proper one, and which I think ought to inserted in this bill, as to the character of the ships that shall carry our mail and receive the compensation provided for in the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the Senator from Iowa if he does not think title 2, page 7, subdivision (c), which provides for the classification of different vessels, is all that is required?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not, I will state to the Senator from California. These clauses or paragraphs in title 2 are clauses and paragraphs which apply only to the vessels that are to receive the general subsidy, and do not apply specifically to vessels that are included in title 1. There are two titles here and two classes of vessels provided for and two classes of service provided for. The one class is intended to embrace all the ships which carry the mails of the United States, and it embraces the conditions under which those contracts shall be made by the Postmaster-General. Title 2 is an inhibition, it is true, as to those ships which receive compensation under title 2, but none of those ships that are provided for in title 1 will register under title 2, it seems to me.

Mr. PERKINS. It being amendatory of an act, it seems to me you can not segregate one subdivision of the bill, but that it must all be considered under that. I ask for information.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not agree with the Senator; and as to this being an amendatory act I will say that I have been or was in the early stages of this examination very much confused with respect to the provision amending the act of 1891. This bill in its title does not anywhere say it is an amendatory act. It does not appear as an amendatory act. It appears as a bill "to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries."

That is the object of the bill. The first section of the bill begins, of course, with an amendment of the act of 1891, but after such examination as I have been able to give it I am satisfied that the first title is an amendment to the act of 1891, and, indeed, actually the whole bill is an amendment to the act of 1891. But I do not see any provision anywhere in the amended measure which requires the mail ships to be of the character that the bill of last year required them to be. So to make sure about that, because there is no difficulty about it, I shall propose to insert an amendment at the end of section 1, line 13, as follows—

and every vessel in respect of which any contract authorized by this act shall be applied for or made, shall be of the Class A1 as classified either by the Record of American and Foreign Shipping or the United States Standard Owners, Builders, and Underwriters' Association, or equivalent classification in any other register of shipping of at least equal merit. All vessels under contract, as provided for in this act, shall be of Class A1 or its equivalent, as hereinbefore in this section mentioned, during the whole period of their service under the contracts provided for in this act.

In other words, that the conditions which apply to the period when the contract shall be made shall be continuous provisions. As the bill now stands all that the Postmaster-General can do, as I understand it, or has authority to do is to receive a certification from the Secretary of the Navy that the ships are of a certain kind and character suitable to the work to be done.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the Senator that if he offers that amendment he offer it on page 6, just before title 2. All of the sections up to that point are simply amendatory of existing law, and the Senator in offering his amendment, it seems to me, should offer it as an additional section.

Mr. ALLISON. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine if he thinks that is better.

Mr. FRYE. I think that is a better place.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought it was wise to put it in at the very point where certain conditions are to be complied with as preliminary to making the contracts. Of course if the Senator prefers to have it as a new section, I have no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I think it would be better to have it as a new section. The first three or four sections simply amend sections of the existing law, so that they shall read so and so. Now, the Senator does not propose to amend existing law with his amendment, but he proposes a distinct affirmative proposition, that the ships before receiving postal contracts under the provisions of the proposed act shall at all times be A1.

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. FRYE. It seems to me that that should be a separate section on page 6 at the end of Title I.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator think it ought to be in each place? The place suggested by the Senator from Iowa is certainly proper, because that is applicable to ships under title 2, and then the same provision should be made as to title 1.

Mr. FRYE. It is now provided for in title 2, and really the requirements here call for the first-class ships anyway. If the amendment should be added on page 6—

No vessel shall receive a contract from the Postmaster-General or receive pay under the contract any longer than it shall be rated in Lloyds, etc., as A1—

Then it would be a separate provision, and would apply to the whole of the foregoing.

Mr. ALLISON. As to the phraseology, I think this is the best. I took it from the bill of last year as reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. I did not notice the phraseology of the Senator's amendment at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing myself that it shall be inserted as a separate section.

Having stated the object and purpose of this amendment, I will modify it so as to meet the views of the chairman of the committee, and make it a separate section.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator from Iowa agree with the Senator from Maine that the provision "as classified either by the Record of American and Foreign Shipping or the United States Standard Owners, Builders, and Underwriters' Association," etc., applies to both classes? Perhaps I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it applies to either title. I have an amendment I want to propose later on that will make it apply to both. I do not understand that there is any requirement in this bill as to the character and classification of the ships under title 1 other than that mentioned in the amended section 4, because, certainly, after saying exactly what the requirements should be, the Postmaster-General would naturally think that other requirements were not necessary.

I call the attention of the Senator to title 2, clause C, line 24, which is a mere clause, saying what classes of vessels shall be excluded from receiving the subsidy under title 2. Therefore, it has no reference whatever to title 1.

Mr. MONEY. I understood that.

Mr. ALLISON. In the bill of last year there was one very valuable amendment which I think ought to be embodied in the bill this year as respects title 2. I do not know whether it should be applied to title 1 or not, but I am sure it should be applied to title 2. Therefore, I shall propose an amendment on page 7, after line 12, section 6, which relates to the subsidy under title 2, which shall require that—

No vessel shall be entitled to the full compensation under this title unless she shall have cleared from a port of the United States with cargo to the amount of 50 per cent of her capacity for carrying commercial cargo, and any shortage in the amount of cargo required and defined as aforesaid shall diminish the amount of the compensation in this paragraph provided for in the proportion that such shortage bears to the total cargo or its equivalent so required.

That is an exact transcript, changing the phraseology to make it applicable to title 2 of the bill of last year, which received the commendation of the Committee on Commerce, and I think it ought to apply to these ships under title 2. I do not think that we ought to pay to the sailing ships of the United States and to the slow-going steamships such a percentage or subsidy as will encourage them to start from our port to a distant oversea port without having at least 50 per cent of their commercial cargo.

I may be mistaken about it, and I will inquire of the nautical gentlemen upon the Committee on Commerce if I have characterized a commercial cargo correctly. I understand that it means practically the net tonnage of the ship, that portion of the ship which can be used for the carrying of freight. I want to add to that provision, however, so as to make it sure as respects this subsidy, an affirmative provision that—

All vessels receiving compensation under this section shall be at least of class A1 or its equivalent, as defined in paragraph (c) of section 7 of this act, during the whole period for which payment is authorized under the provisions of this title.

That is to say, that we will have good ships under the general clause here as well as good ships under our provisions respecting the United States mails.

Now, there is another thing that I think ought to be done in this bill. As I said before, I have been somewhat confused by the statements which have been made from time to time as respects the effect of the bill. The Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, stated that for the next five years under no circumstances that he could conceive of would the amount required be more than $5,000,000 in any one year. The bill of last year provided for an annual expenditure of $9,000,000, and this bill has no limitation thus far, but I think there should be some limitation upon the amount expended.

I do not say that that limitation, if it is found to be inadequate, will not or ought not to be revised, but I do think that at intervals at least of eight or ten years we ought to have an opportunity of affirmatively dealing with the questions of amount.

I will say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that I may have misled him somewhat in a remark I made the other day. I said when this bill was passed and when all these contracts and arrangements were made—I am not certain whether I used the word "contracts" or not, but when these arrangements were made—the interest of Congress would disappear, unless we proposed to alter the amount or repeal the act.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; I did not misunderstand the Senator in that regard. What I said related simply to the bill in its present shape.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true in fact, although, as the Senator from Georgia very well said the other day, after contracts have been made we are bound to make appropriation from year to year to carry out and execute those contracts; and of late years it is not a new thing for us to make contracts far beyond expenditures. I apprehend that before this Congress shall end we will be called upon in various ways and by various methods to provide that the War Department may enter into contracts for public works beyond the appropriations made for that purpose.

But it has been the policy of the Government and of Congress, in every such case, to give notice and warning to those who entered into those contracts that they are made upon the condition of future appropriations to be made according to law, and that is a notice to the contractor that those who have the responsibility here and in the other Chamber shall have an opportunity of revising the conditions of a particular improvement or project when the time comes for the appropriations to be made. Therefore it is that we have always hitherto, in one form or another, held to the idea that as respects expenditures not immediately to be made or presently to be made, the Congress of the United States should have an opportunity of saying first whether money is to be borrowed for that purpose or whether money is in the Treasury or whether taxes are to be levied to meet these expenditures.

Under this clause in title 1 of the bill, whilst it is true that there is no appropriation made to carry it out, if these contracts are to be carried out by appropriations, Congress will be called upon and must be called upon annually to make the appropriations. That is, I understand, the first clause of the bill. But if we authorize the Postmaster-General to enter into a contract lasting for fifteen years, which is within one year of eight Congresses to be elected, entailing for this uncertain and I hope effective purpose appropriations which we are bound in honor to make after these contracts are made, with no other supervision over them that we can ascertain whether or not those who entered into a contract or their assigns have complied with the contract as made by the Postmaster-General.

I have no doubt that a Postmaster-General—the present Postmaster-General, in whose ability I have great faith, will care for the interests of the Government of the United States I am sure—in making these contracts will surround them with the most careful provisions as respects the expenditure. But we ought here, as the legislative power, to see to it that we put in the bill such safeguards as will not be misinterpreted either by the Postmaster-General or by contractors who would have an opportunity of a conflict which would lead of course in the end to litigation.

So, Mr. President, I believe we ought to limit the aggregate amount in this contract, and I have provided an amendment which I will offer. It may be inadequately or imperfectly drawn. It is to be inserted on page 6, after line 1. I make the amendment apply only to title 1. I do not make it appyly to title 2. At the end of section 4, page 6, line 1, where some words have been already stricken out, I believe, I propose to offer for insertion the following additional proviso.

And provided further, That until July 1, 1907, not more than $5,000,000 shall be expended in any one year under the contracts provided for in this title, and after that date not more that $8,000,000 shall be expended in any one year under the contracts provided for in this title.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me? That amendment would simply apply to the mail pay, would it not?

Mr. ALLISON. It applies to the mail pay. I will reach the other question later on, and if necessary an amendment can be made to that. This amendment applies only to title 1:

And after that date not more than $8,000,000 shall be expended in any one year under the contracts provided for in this title; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such regulations for the payment of said compensation as will cause any excess in the total amount of compensation earned under this title in any one fiscal year over and above said sums respectively to be deducted pro rata from the total compensation due each person or corporation under this title during said fiscal year.

In other words, I propose here in this title to authorize an expenditure within a million dollars of the total expenditure provided for in the bill of last year, because I sympathize with most of what has been said respecting the importance of expanding our opportunities in new countries for our commerce. I believe, as I said the other day, that we ought to have in some way provision made whereby we would establish a line of steamers to South America on the Atlantic coast and another on the Pacific coast. I believe that we should establish a line of steamers from the coast of California over the Pacific Ocean to China and Japan and intermediate places.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me a moment, to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I think the amendment suggested by him is extremely important. It is to limit the amount. Whether the amount named is a proper one or not, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not, either. I do not know.

Mr. BACON. The suggestion I wish to make, with the permission of the Senator, is that if there is a limitation it is practicable to do what otherwise would not be practicable, to wit, to make provision for the establishment of the particular service which he now mentions. If there is a limitation then the question of proportion must be dealt with.

I suggest to the Senator (I would very much prefer he should make it himself rather than offer it myself) that if there is a limitation there ought to be a further provision that such a proportion of it—say one-fourth, one-fifth, or one-sixth, whatever may be deemed to be proper—shall be expended in payment of mail service between the Eastern ports of the United States and South America, another proportion for the other lines which he indicated, and so on. It seems to me that that is the only possible way by which there can be any practical good accomplished in the line indicated by the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. That provision, perhaps, ought to be made. We debated here last year ad libitum how we should cut and divide the $9,000,000. I did not propose to do it here; but I wanted to make the sum large enough to enable the line of steamers that are now carrying our mails to continue and to enable the Postmaster-General to establish new mail lines. We are not establishing new mail lines when we establish other lines of fast ships to Liverpool or to Southampton. We have our mail facilities to those ports, whether carried in our own ships or carried in the ships of other countries.

I dropped a tear or two when I heard the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] speak of the humiliation he had experienced as he saw the portraits of our fathers going into distant regions of the country in foreign ships. I have that feeling myself, but I mitigate it somewhat when I reflect that I frequently receive by our line a letter from Germany and now and then a letter from other parts of the world with a German stamp, a French stamp, etc., on it. I also have a sympathy and a warm feeling for the consul in South Africa who was compelled to live there and serve his country for four long years without seeing the American flag. I did not drop a tear for him because I knew he could resign at any time. [Laughter.]

Now, we are told that we are a world power, and we are, at least so far as we have exerted ourselves. But Mr. President, it is not within the power of the Committee on Commerce or of Congress to expand ourselves in a single year or in a decade whereby our ships will be seen with great frequency upon every sea and in every land.

We have just acquired Mindanao, in the Philippine Archipelago, which, I believe, is the second largest island in that archipelago. I have an idea that it will be some time before we will see many of our sailing vessels or many of our steamships there. Our steamships and our sailing vessels will go where there is trade and business, and the bulk of our trade and business, whatever we may think or whatever we may do, will be with European countries.

I was interested to-day in listening to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who pictured to us that with the passage of this bill we would practically do the carrying trade between here and Europe. He told us that we have lost so many hundred millions of dollars—I think a couple hundred millions annually—by not carrying in our own ships the great amount of freight that we provide for the world. That is true.

So my friend from California [Mr. PERKINS], in his most interesting and valuable contribution to this debate, informed us that there are American owners who own ships to the extent of 672,000 tons, and then, with a sufficient interval between that period and the next, he told us how much we had lost by allowing our money to go to other lands and other countries because of foreign register.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, my friend from Iowa is correct. What I want to do is to build the six hundred and seventy-odd thousand tons in the United States by American mechanics, who buy their supplies principally in the State of Iowa; and therefore we will all be benefited by building those ships here. But they are owned now by Americans who have had the ships built in foreign countries. The Senator and myself are in accord on that proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. We are in absolute sympathy; I want to accomplish exactly the same thing. But I have an idea that after all this is done there will still be some of the people who own ships abroad who will occasionally sail into our ports and carry something of our products away.

Therefore I have not that exalted idea of what will come in the distant future that some of my friends have who are favoring this bill, though I think this bill will be of service. It has already been of service in attracting American capital in the direction of the ocean and its conquest, as is shown by the report of the Comsioner of Navigation. Whilst speaking of him, I wish to say that I think Congress is indebted to him for most valuable information concerning everything connected with our own shipping and the shipping of the world, for his report is an encyclopedia of valuable information.

I had some doubts whether American capital had actually acquired the Leyland Line, but, turning to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, I find it stated officially that Americans have purchased that line, embracing all the ships of that line, I believe, that sail into our ports, thereby acquiring a very large tonnage. Mr. Ellerman stated to the stockholders of that company the reason he had for selling the line. He said that the greatest proportion of freight on the Atlantic was that which was east bound, chiefly from our country; that he had been credibly informed—I do not use his exact words, of course, but I think I am quoting the substance of what he said—that within a short time arrangements would be made in this country whereby its immense freight would be controlled or directed by American citizens, and he feared, if he did not sell his ships, that these American citizens would build other ships, and put this freight upon those ships, and, therefore, he thought it was wise for him to allow those American gentlemen to secure that line, and he had no doubt that they would continue it as a valuable line.

It may be that this bill will not only have a tendency to promote the building of ships in our country, but that it will have a tendency to call the attention of American capitalists to the value of having more ships owned by our people, and thereby minimize the enormous sums that our friends say have annually gone into the pockets of the people of Europe for doing our carrying trade.

But I wish to go about this in such a way as that it will not only be effective, but that it will be approved by the people of our country. So I have provided for this limitation upon the amount in order that our people may be told by the law itself the maximum amount for which they will be liable from year to year under the provisions of this bill. If we do not fix some maximum, I shall be told and some of you will be told that it will cost $50,000,000 a year, for I doubt not that will be about the amount that will be estimated as the cost by next October.

It may not be stated at over $25,000,000 in Iowa, but there will be sections of the country where the bill will be commented upon and the people will be told that it is going to cost $50,000,000 a year, and that it must be paid for by taxation taken out of their pockets.

I want to have a limitation, and one that will be just and even generous, if what was said last year was either just or generous, respecting the amount that is to be devoted to this particular business.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator, as he is making a very interesting speech, if we are going to spend four or five million dollars more for the purpose of carrying the mails than is necessary to be expended? Taking it for granted that it is necessary to have a first class foreign mail service, is it not true that the bill ought to specify how much we are going to expend on the Pacific, how much on the Atlantic, and how much in South American ports? Then, on a business basis, ought there not to be set forth in this bill what new routes we expect to establish? There is not a single one specified in this bill from the beginning to the end.

Mr. ALLISON. Very likely that ought to be done.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to ask my friend from Iowa a question for information, as we are all in quest of light. Referring to the query made by our friend from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] to the Senator from Iowa, I read from title 1, on page 2, line 4, down to line 10, where it is stated that the Postmaster-General in entering into contracts is to have regard to the national defense, and to make such contracts as will best subserve and promote the postal, commercial, and maritime interests of the United States:

> The mail service on such lines to be equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports. Said contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder for the performance of said service on each route.

It seems to me that gives the Postmaster-General discretion and judgment to establish new lines.

Mr. ALLISON. It does; it gives him the discretion and judgment; but I think we should hesitate very much in giving too wide a discretion. I should certainly be willing to give a very large discretion to the Postmaster-General, as I would to the President; but we have been told on this floor over and over again that we could not trust the President to fix the line of the Nicaragua Canal or the Panama Canal; that we could not lodge in him any such discretion; but yet we provide here for discretion to be given to the Postmaster-General that will enable him to build up Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle, Portland, etc.

They can not all immediately have lines of steamers; they must wait and get the lines gradually, and the places having the best facilities will, of course, have the first opportunity. But what I want to do here is not to go so far as the Senator from Georgia would have me go, although I should be willing to put into this bill a provision for two or three lines of steamships and make it specific and eliminate from it everything else; but I have gone as far as it is necessary for me to go——

Mr. CLAY. I will ask the Senator, with his permission, ought we to undertake to spend four or five million dollars in establishing these new routes without some recommendation from the Postmaster-General and without an estimate of the cost? There is not a single word in his report in regard to it.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very good suggestion, and yet I have an idea that the committees of this body do know fairly well what the cost will be. We have had discussions on this question, I believe, ever since I have been in the Senate. There may have been a little hiatus for a year or two, but we have had such discussions year by year, and we have had reports from year to year. In what our friends on the other side call "the good old Democratic days" we had subsidy galore; and one thing that leads me to think that we ought to make this special provision is that in those days, when the Democrats had control, they provided for a subsidy for a steamship line to Liverpool, another to Southampton, another to Bremen, and another to Havre.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I stated in some remarks I delivered this afternoon that "subsidy" had no terror for me when properly regulated.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sure the Senator is right about that. We have an established line to Southampton. I do not believe we should establish other lines to Europe until we have exploited those new regions of the earth where we expect to have a large increase of trade.

I have not put a limitation upon title 2 of this bill, but if I had my way about it, I think I should strike it out. As it stands now it is a provision which does subsidize every steamship and every sailing ship that can come within the provisions of the bill, whether the tonnage of the particular ship is 1,000 or 10,000. I believe there is a limitation of 20 tons in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. TELLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says this bill subsidizes every ship. Is not that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. It would look to the ordinary observer as if that were the purpose of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I should think so.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose that is the purpose of it. I do not believe that we should go into this wholesale subsidy business until we have particularized our lines more than we have thus far done and extended our commerce in our own ships into other regions than those where we now are. I can see no particular reason—I am very frank with my brethren on both sides of the Chamber—why we should subsidize a sailing ship of 400 or 500 tons which starts out of Charleston Harbor and sails to Habana.

The islands in the Caribbean Sea and on our Atlantic shore are tributary to us chiefly as respects their commerce, and naturally so, and our people will sail the ships that go there. Are they not sailing them now? Is not the greater portion of our carrying trade with those islands done in American ships? I do not know how that may be; I may be wrong about it; and, if so, the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] or the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], can tell me.

Mr. FRYE. The chairman did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I was speaking of title 2. I say I do not see just now why we should subsidize ships that go to near-by ports which do not do an oversea carrying trade, but ships sailing, if you please, from Baltimore to Habana or from Charleston to Habana. I think those ships—I may be mistaken—are doing very well now, whether they be sailing ships or steamships, at least they have been long in control of that trade. If I am mistaken in saying that we already have the bulk of that trade, of course my argument falls to the ground in that respect.

So we have a considerable trade with our northeast coast, not very large, but I myself remember very well seeing a ship loading with a cargo of hay grown in the northeast, either in New Brunswick or beyond, bound for Boston. I fancy that that ship was not being loaded at a loss. That trade, in the very nature of things, must be local. It will not expand our commerce into distant seas and into distant countries. So I shall be glad to have more clearly stated here the limitations under which this over-sea commerce shall be carried on.

There is a limitation here, I agree, of 150 miles. That may cut off a few people, I do not know how many; but it may cut off, for instance, vessels engaged in trade between Tampa and Habana.

Mr. FRYE. It will cut off Vancouver, Tampa, Eastport, St. John, New Brunswick——

Mr. PERKINS. And Lower California.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; and Lower California.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; but how about Portland and St. John?

Mr. FRYE. It cuts off Portland.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator to say that Portland is less than 150 miles from St. John? I have not looked at the map recently, but the usual route of steamships——

Mr. FRYE. Every steamer that leaves Portland for St. John always stops at Eastport, and from Eastport to St. John is only 150 miles.

I beg pardon of the Chair for not first addressing the Chair and getting the leave of the Senator from Iowa to interrupt him.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all right. I really made the inquiry of the Senator because I was not certain respecting the matter.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I ask, How is Tampa cut out of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. FRYE. The distance from Tampa to Cuba is less than 150 miles.

Mr. MALLORY. It is more than that; it is 320 miles.

Mr. FRYE. Then Tampa is not cut off.

Mr. MALLORY. All those vessels stop at Key West on their way, and Key West is only 85 miles from Habana.

Mr. MONEY. But there is other freight besides the freight to Cuba. What about Jamaica? What about the Leeward and the Windward islands?

Mr. FRYE. For short voyages, say 1,500 or 2,000 miles, vessels only receive 70 per cent of the subsidy under this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, but all the ships plying between North American ports only receive 70 per cent of the subsidy.

Mr. MONEY. I will call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that cutting off a port of the United States from some other port does not cut it off from all the others with which it trades. You will find upon investigation that there is not a port that has trade that amounts to anything that is cut off.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to correct myself and call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the 70 per cent only applies to mail steamships. It does not apply to title 2, which contains the general subsidy provision. I do not think such vessels as we have been referring to are cut off from the general subsidy. I see no provision looking to that.

Mr. FRYE. How could it apply to mail ships?

Mr. ALLISON. Because they are specifically provided for. The provision on page 5, beginning in line 15, is as follows:

> The rates of compensation to a steamship to be employed in carrying the mails to a foreign port in North America under any contract hereafter to be made under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 70 per cent of the maximum rates established by this section, etc.

Mr. FRYE. That is true.

Mr. ALLISON. So that does not apply to title 2, sailing and steamships.

Mr. President, I did not intend when I rose to do anything more than to make a few explanations of some amendments which I shall offer to this bill.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, as I was obliged to go out of the Chamber for a few moments, I wish to ask if the Senator from Iowa has proposed any amendment or limitation under the general subsidy?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not proposed any, but I believe I shall propose one on page 7, line 4.

Mr. FRYE. I am sorry now that I suggested it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. On page 7, line 4, section 6, after the words "steam vessel," I move to insert "of over 1,000 gross registered tons." I wish also to offer an amendment to title 2, on page 8, line 13, after the word "trade," by inserting as a new clause:

> H. Steamers which during their trials have not obtained a minimum speed of 8 knots, half-loaded.

I will say to the Senate that in France they have such a requirement, except that the minimum limit of speed is 10 knots. If these steamers are to receive a subsidy at all, I think we ought to provide that they should go at least as fast as a vigorous, rapid young man can walk. [Laughter.] There is another amendment which I shall offer, which I presume will not be acceded to by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, steamers when they undergo their trials do not carry any cargo. Neither the naval ships nor any others carry cargoes when they are on trial.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose the builders can determine what their ships would do if they were half loaded. There must be some rule by which when a steamer carrying no freight is on trial an estimate can be made as to what she would do when heavily laden. In other words, I offer this amendment with a view of seeing whether or not there should not be some limitation in this bill as to the speed of steam vessels which are to receive the subsidy. I think there should be such a provision.

To come under the provisions of this bill vessels ought to be required to so carry freight as to be able to get somewhere at some particular time. In other words, if we are to pay our people for carrying freight across the ocean, they ought to be required to make some sort of speed in doing it. In my judgment we should not give the subsidy at all to this class of ships, but if we do we certainly ought to fix some minimum speed.

Mr. TELLER. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. It strikes me that the Senator can reach the end he desires by striking out entirely the greater part of title 2.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I should.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the Senator propose his amendment in that way.

Mr. FRYE. That is a very bad suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON. I give notice that I shall offer the amendment I have just stated and also another amendment to come in after the amendment I have just offered, and to be denominated "I," which will read:

> I. Vessels which in the same voyage are engaged in traffic exclusively reserved to vessels of the United States.

I do not think that the coastwise trade should be so mixed with the over-sea trade as to allow the mixing of voyages.

In making these observations and suggestions I will say frankly to the Senate that I have very great doubt about this bill, and I offer these amendments in the hope that they may be agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. Did the Senator offer an amendment to the general subsidy feature? I did not catch his words exactly.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not, and I will state the reason for it. As I understand this general feature, it can be repealed at any time. The evils or ills connected with it will probably be developed very soon. But I think that we ought not to grant this general subsidy at all; that we ought to rest content with establishing these new mail lines, these new steamers that are to contest with the vessels of other countries for the supremacy of the sea.

MONUMENT OF MARSHAL DE ROCHAMBEAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 162) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and to the families of Marshal de Rochambeau and Marquis de Lafayette an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the dedication of the monument of Marshal de Rochambeau, to be unveiled in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. This joint resolution is almost if not quite an exact copy of the measure passed by the Senate, except as to the appropriation, and this is the amount desired by the State Department. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution (S. R. 68) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General de Rochambeau an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the dedication ceremonies of the monument of General de Rochambeau to be unveiled in the city of Washington, and that it be recalled from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD KERSHNER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved, That the message of the President and the bill (H. R. 5224) for the relief of Edward Kershner be transmitted to the Senate with the request that the Senate reconsider its action in passing said bill in order that an amendment may be made to the same by striking out the word "director" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "inspector."

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out "director" and insert "inspector."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 it is proposed to strike out "director" and insert "inspector," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint Edward Kershner as medical inspector in the Navy on the retired list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1348) to provide for ocean-mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and the common defense; to promote commerce, and to encourage the deep-sea fisheries.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendments which I intend to offer to the pending bill may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when I was upon the floor this afternoon at the time I presented the tables there was some discussion as to whether there is a discrimination in this bill, under title 2, against ships under 1,000 tons burden. I was very strong in my recollection that there was, but I was unable at the time to refer to the precise item. It is found on page 7 of the bill, in subdivision (b). In providing for compensation under subdivision (a) all ships, without reference to the question of burden or tonnage, are entitled to 1 cent per gross registered tons for each 100 nautical miles sailed.

That refers to ships now in existence or in existence at the time of the passage of the bill. Then under subdivision (b) all ships hereafter built which shall exceed 1,000 tons shall have an additional compensation of one-quarter of 1 cent. That is the extent of the discrimination. Vessels under 1,000 tons hereafter built are not entirely excluded, but they have not the same compensation as those above 1,000 tons.

There is one other point to which, as I am on my feet, I desire to call attention, and that is this: The bill in title 1 provides for certain compensation to be paid, according to tonnage, to all ships which shall attain a certain speed, whether they carry mail or not—that is, if they come within the classification required here. It defines in what the first class shall consist—that is on page 3—ships over 10,000 tons and of 20 knots or over; the second class, 19 knots and less than 20 knots and over 5,000 tons, and so on. The highest requisite in order to get the first classification is 20 knots and 10,000 tons.

The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate is this: Under the bill, if it becomes a law, any ship of 10,000 tons which can make 20 knots an hour will be entitled to this compensation for fifteen years, if the contract is made for that length of time, and up to the conclusion of the fifteen years, provided, under the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], she continues within the classification, regardless of the fact whether she carries any mail or not.

We are evidently upon the eve of a great development in shipbuilding, under which there is going to be great increase in speed, and before the fifteen years are up the ships which will thus be entitled to this compensation will not be carrying any mail, certainly not between the great ports, because all indications now point to the result that before that time ships will be upon the sea which will carry mail so much more rapidly that they will naturally be given it to carry.

In this connection I desire to have the Secretary read an article which appeared in the New York World of March 9, giving a statement of the ships which are now arranged for and the building of which is about to be begun by the great companies now owning trans-Atlantic lines of steamers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GIANT CUNARDERS TO MAKE 25 KNOTS—TO COST $3,000,000 EACH AND CROSS THE ATLANTIC IN FOUR DAYS AND SIXTEEN HOURS—ONLY ANOTHER LINK IN MARINE EVOLUTION—NEW SHIPS PROJECTED BY RIVAL LINES, THEIR SIZE AND DATES OF THEIR MAIDEN APPEARANCES.

The report from London that the Cunard Steamship Company, Limited, is to bring out chum world beaters in size and speed, thereby reducing the traversing of the 2,800 knots between Queenstown and Sandy Hook to four days and sixteen hours, is only another link in the chain of evolution of the steamship.

The paddling of the 412-ton steamer Sirius across the waved-tossed Atlantic between April 5 and the 23d of the same month in 1838 was more of a marvel than the mere announcement to-day of the coming of the greatest vessels the world has ever seen.

Not unexpected is this step forward of the Cunard Line, for the proud position it holds in the estimation of ocean travelers, its immense social prestige, and its almost unequaled record—"not a life lost in more than fifty years, except through the fault of the victim"—make it imperative that the company should retake the laurels won from it by the swift creations of cunning German shipbuilders.

WILL BE OVER 700 FEET LONG.

The two new vessels, it is announced, will be more than 700 feet long, with engines of 48,000 horsepower, capable of driving each ship 25 knots an hour.

The horsepower alone will be far beyond the driving capacity of any marine machinery ever embedded in a hull. The most powerful engines ever built for a ship are those of the Deutschland—35,000 horsepower—so that the addition of 13,000 horsepower ought certainly to add 2 or 3 knots to the Hamburg-American liner's rate of speed.

The question of increased speed with longer hulls, the driving power being the same, is one of mathematics, but practice shows that the higher the horsepower the more of it is required to produce an additional knot. With each knot of engine-producing capacity the heavier must be the fabric to support the machinery.

The new boats will follow the general outlines of the Campania and Lucania, which have given such useful results. They will be built by the same firm, the Fairfield Company, Limited, of Glasgow. Each vessel will cost, it is said, $3,000,000. The company will issue new bonds for the purpose of raising the funds to lay down the ships.

Regarding the application of the immense power, it is not to be tolerated in thought that the turbine system will be adopted, for the rudimentary form of the rotary steam engine has not yet demonstrated its practicability and safety as a propelling power for ships.

The new vessels will each have accommodations for 4,000 persons, surpassing in passenger capacity the Celtic, the broadest ship afloat, by nearly 1,000.

For purposes of comparison it will be interesting to observe what other lines are doing in the way of shipbuilding, their progress being the spur that impels forward their doughty British rival.

OTHER BIG SHIPS BUILDING.

The North German Lloyd line fabric Kaiser Wilhelm II, now on the stocks in the yards of the Vulcans at Stettin, is 707 feet long, or 3 feet longer than the Oceanic. She will be 72 feet in beam. She is intended to eclipse anything afloat. The Kaiser Wilhelm II will be launched next October, and make her maiden trip to New York in April, 1903.

Capt. Heinrich Engelhart, who has been nearly twenty-two years in the service of the North German Lloyd as master, is overlooking the construction of the Kaiser Wilhelm II, and affording the builders the benefit of his experience.

Almost simultaneously with the announcement of the new Cunarders comes the report that the Hamburg-American Line has awarded a contract for a steamer 725 feet long, with a guaranteed speed of 25½ knots, about twelve hours faster than the Deutschland.

Mr. BACON. Against these ships making 25 knots an hour, the pending bill proposes to subsidize ships which shall run in speed from the first-class at 20 knots an hour down to the seventh class at 14 knots an hour, and, as I said before, if there shall be, as there is now promised, such development that mail can be carried across the ocean at the rate of 25 knots an hour, still, under this bill, if no mail can be subjected to the slow passage of from 14 to 20 knots an hour, for the next fifteen years the subsidy is to be paid to those ships, not according to the amount of mail carried, but according to the tonnage of the ship, even though they may not carry one single pound of mail and even though, under the possibilities or the probabilities indicated by the article just read, not a pound of mail could possibly be subjected to so great an inconvenience as to be sent by ships of such slow speed.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate briefly on the pending bill, and necessarily in a very general way. I have listened very attentively to the speeches which have been made in favor of the bill and in opposition to it. To the general object of the bill no good American, I think, can find himself in opposition. The lamentable condition of our merchant marine is one thing that is not open to debate. The desirability of becoming able to carry the products of the American farm and factory in ships sailing under our own flag is not open to question.

I became, years ago, and I was no more in favor then than I am now, and no less, of upbuilding the merchant marine of the United States—persuaded that the best way to do it is by the restoration of the old policy under the operation of which it was first made a great merchant marine. I think my mind was led in that direction somewhat by the President pro tempore of the Senate, the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who once said:

I believe, and have always believed, that the true method of revival is through discriminating duties; that the fathers were right.

The 1896 platform of the party to which I belong, and which I very earnestly supported, declared:

We favor restoring the American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in the foreign carrying trade, so that American ships—the product of American labor, employed in American shipyards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans—may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce.

The nominee of that convention, William McKinley, in his letter of acceptance, wrote upon the subject as follows:

The declaration of the Republican platform in favor of the upbuilding of our merchant marine has my hearty approval. The policy of discriminating duties in favor of our shipping which prevailed in the early years of our history should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas are fully attained. We should no longer contribute directly or indirectly to the maintenance of the colossal marine of foreign countries, but provide an efficient and complete marine of our own.

The obstacle which exists, it is said, and it may be true, to the adoption of that method of restoring our merchant marine—the discriminating duties—is the large number of treaties, some of them very old, which we have entered into with foreign governments

Mr. TELLER. It is no greater now than in 1896.

Mr. SPOONER. It is no greater now than in 1896. All of those treaties, I think, but two or three, upon short notice, comparatively, can be brought to a termination. I think these treaties have been one trouble with our merchant marine in the past. Men differ about the cause of its decadence, but it has seemed to me that the Government has been placed and is to-day in a very humiliating attitude.

It seems a very unhappy thing for a great government to have so bound itself not to treat its own ships and shipowners any differently, no matter how strong the pressure of sound policy and national safety may require otherwise, than it treats the ships of its competitors on the sea. If the Government has so tied its hands, is the handicap to be perpetual?

I am not able to say to what degree, if we should denounce those treaties, as provided by their terms, retaliation would follow which would be harmful to our commerce and to our interests. I can not estimate it, for it is more or less a technical subject with which I do not profess to be very familiar. Certainly I have not mastered it. I do not, however, take kindly to the proposition that we are forever to be bound and that we are remitted, because of these contracts, to experiments such as were proposed in the last bill, and such as I think are proposed in this bill, and in a few words I will state very briefly why.

We will have retaliation anyway. Our competitors will not surrender supremacy on the sea without a fight. It is not the nature of man or nations to do it, and it is not to be expected.

Mr. CULLOM. Do you mean war?

Mr. SPOONER. No; I do not mean war, of course.

Mr. CULLOM. I supposed you did not.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; and if my remark might be so interpreted, I thank the Senator for asking me the question.

I assume, now, for the purposes of what little I want to say on this bill that we are excluded from a resort to the method favored by the convention of 1896, and not changed, either, by the convention of 1900, and that we can not at this time safely put an end to these treaties, and must therefore resort to some other method.

At the last session I gave very careful study to the bill—Hanna-Frye bill, as it was popularly called—and I came to the conclusion—I may have been wrong about it—that a subsidy, to be efficacious in building up the merchant marine of the United States, must be accompanied by the contract system, and one great trouble I had with the bill last year was the limitation of the annual expenditure.

It seemed to me very clear, with the provision for the admission of foreign-built ships then under contract and the payment of half subsidy thereto, and with the limitation contained in the bill, the bonds that were required, and the facility for contracts under the bill, that before ten days had passed after its enactment the annual limit would be reached, and that during the life of those contracts ships would not be built, for the reason, as I understood it then, that the subsidy provided by the bill was simply adequate, and no more, to overcome the adverse conditions existing between our shipowners and shipowners across the sea, both in the cost of construction and the cost of operation, and having regard also to the mail subsidies and the admiralty subventions.

It seemed clear to me, although not to most of my brethren on this side of the Chamber, that the effect of that bill would of necessity be to bunch the whole appropriation in a comparatively few hands and to discourage, because of the want of a sufficient sum to equalize conditions as to new ships, the construction of new ships under its provisions. I have carried into my study of this bill, so far as I have been able to study it, some of the thoughts which controlled me, in a way, last session, for I could not have voted for that bill.

I will deal for a moment only with title 1. This is called "compensation" for mail service. We all know that that is not what it is. It is not a mere matter of compensation for carrying the mail. We can carry the mail cheaper on other ships, so far as that is concerned, but every man, I take it, considers it a desirable object, and one that ought to be accomplished if possible, that the mails of the United States shall be carried in ships of the United States and under the flag of the United States.

It is a ship subsidy, and I have no fear of the word "subsidy," as my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] says he has not. But this is what has troubled me about it. I am not opposed to mail subsidies, but I do not like to vote for fifteen-year contracts, involving the appropriation from the Treasury of vast sums of money, unless it is quite obvious that the purpose which is sought to be accomplished by it will be accomplished by it, and that I have not been able to ascertain from this debate or otherwise.

On the contrary, what information I have been able to obtain upon the subject in the debate has caused me to doubt it. The object is to give a mail pay not simply for carrying the mails of the United States, as I understand it, but to overcome, or, to employ the better word, used by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], to equalize the conditions between ships of the United States and the corresponding ships of other governments.

Now, does this do it? Senators on the Democratic side contend that there are no adverse conditions; that we can construct ships as cheaply in this country as they are constructed in England. I doubt it. They contend that ships can be operated as cheaply under the American flag as they can be operated under a foreign flag. I doubt that. I assume in what I have to say that Senators on this side are correct in their statement that the difference in cost of construction between ships built in the United States and ships built in the shipyards abroad is at least 25 per cent.

The letter from the president of the Atlantic Transport Company seems very clearly to establish that.

It is contended on this side also, Mr. President, that the difference in the cost of operation is much greater. Some put it at 25 per cent; I think my friend from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] put it at 20 per cent. I may be mistaken about that. Was it 20 or 25?

Mr. HANNA. Twenty-five to 30.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; 25 to 30 per cent.

Mr. HANNA. But I want to explain in this connection that the difference in the scale of wages in the competition we have with foreign shipping is not confined to England.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that.

Mr. HANNA. So while I said it is 25 to 30, I could have said the difference in wages is 20 to 30 per cent, covering Germany, England, Italy, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. So far as prices are concerned, does Germany pay higher rates of wages than England?

Mr. HANNA. No.

Mr. ELKINS. No; lower.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well, stating it generally, call it 25 per cent. Some say it is 30 per cent; some say it is 33⅓ per cent. That is not all the difference. First, you have a great difference in the cost of construction. Then you have a great difference in the cost of operation. Then you have in addition to that the admiralty subvention and the mail subsidy, and perhaps some other allowances by some governments.

Mr. President, does this bill equalize those conditions? It was stated at the last session when the other bill was under discussion that the subsidies provided by it did no more than equalize conditions. I think it would not be contended by the men who advocated the measure that it did more than to equalize the conditions, for I can not understand how such a proposition could be supported. All that could be asked is that the conditions be equalized, and, being equalized, that our ships, sailed under our flag, take their chances in the battle for commerce.

I asked the Senator from Maine the other day if the mail pay and the subsidy provided by this bill is greater or less than the rates of subsidy provided by the bill which we considered at the last session. He said "Less." I inquired of him how much less. The Senator had not figured it; he was not able to say. I offered a resolution, which was answered by the Secretary of the Treasury, which shows that in almost every instance it is less. I asked the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] to-day in regard to it.

That Senator had not figured it. I regard this as a pivotal point upon this subject—I may be wrong about it—because if you do not equalize conditions it is a waste of public money. Why? It certainly would not lead to the construction of new ships. A very little additional admiralty subvention, a very little additional subsidy by our competitors, which I think they would promptly give, would intensify the difficulty. If these rates are short of the equalizing point, as they certainly seem to be, what will be the result of these payments? Simply the payment under this bill to the ships now in existence of a vastly larger sum than they are receiving now.

So the experiment about this bill is (and I should feel differently about it if I knew, and we ought to be enabled to know it) whether this rate equalizes the conditions, so as to lead to the construction of new ships.

There is only one absolutely certain thing about it, and that is that existing ships will receive this added subsidy. To my mind, that is a mere gift, unless adverse conditions are overcome, so as to secure new ships. I believe the people of the United States will be willing to pay a large sum of money for the creation of steamship lines to carry the mails to distant ports, to build up the trade of the United States, but I think they want to be certain when they appropriate the money that it will accomplish the object.

There is another thing about the bill, which is perhaps more a matter of detail, that has troubled me a little. I have not been able to see quite why the maximum subsidy rate should be the same on all mail routes. It has seemed to me that if a new route is to be established, a route from some of the ports of the United States to South America, where our trade is very small and where the profit for years to come from passengers and cargo will be relatively small, they should have a larger maximum subsidy, a greater measure of encouragement, than should be given the ships plowing the ocean between New York and Liverpool and countries where we already and for a great many years have had an established and constantly increasing trade.

The same may be said of a new mail route from Pacific ports to the Orient. But under the bill the maximum rate for the new line which is to build up trade is the same as it is for the old line plying between this country and a country with which the trade has been long established.

I have thought, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that it might be wise to establish some definite routes in the bill, to put some elasticity into it, and to afford, even if it took larger subsidy, a greater encouragement in some lines than on other lines, and to enable the Postmaster-General to contract for it. I would be willing to vote for it.

Now, Mr. President, we have had within the last few years, I have supposed, a very great revival of our merchant marine. I have thought our shipyards were busy and full of work, and it had not occurred to me either that that was with sole reference to the certainty, as it seems to have been regarded, that Congress would pass a subsidy bill. The Senator from Iowa says we were number 2 last year among the nations in building ships.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. I think it is only fair in this connection to repeat what I said before, that almost the entire construction of the past year has been for the coastwise trade.

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely.

Mr. HANNA. Eight or ten vessels were built for the foreign trade. If that had been measured by the countries of Europe as building vessels for the foreign trade it would be a fair comparison.

Mr. SPOONER. I speak of shipbuilding.

Mr. HANNA. I know.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all; we have been increasing our tonnage all the time.

Mr. HANNA. Very largely.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought that was natural. I thought that the time had come, our commerce had so expanded, the balance of trade was so greatly in our favor, there was such immense prosperity in our country, that the attention of capital was being attracted to shipbuilding and shipowning, and it has been. There have been purchased within a year of foreign-built ships to be owned, as I understand it, by American owners, 1,400,000 tons. There were two lines, the Leyland Line and the Dominion Line.

I have had an idea that this matter would take care of itself if you would give it a chance. I am willing to help it if we can be made certain that it will help it. I am not willing—every Senator acts upon his own responsibility, upon his own judgment—lightly or blindly, to vote $5,000,000 a year for fifteen years, or $10,000,000, out of the Treasury, if it is not surely to lead to the upbuilding of our merchant marine, but is in the end simply to go as a largess to ships already constructed.

The Senator from Iowa referred to a speech made by Mr. Ellerman, who was chairman of the Leyland Company at a meeting of the stockholders, and evidently a man of great ability not only as a shipmaster or manager but as a very clear speaker and practical business man. This is what he said. It was a speech made by him to the stockholders of the Leyland Line. It had been reorganized, and under his management had been extremely profitable. He had made a provisional contract to sell out to Mr. Morgan and associates his stock except the preference shares. He had 71,000 shares of the common stock.

Mr. ALLISON. A majority.

Mr. SPOONER. A majority. But, like a gentleman, he treated his associates as he would want them to treat him, and he secured their right to sell their shares if they chose at the same price he proposed to sell his for, and he gave the reasons to the stockholders which influenced him to make the sale. He said:

It is found in the report of our Commissioner of Navigation for 1901:

> But we must look at this matter all round, and I am bound to tell you that there are two factors in regard to the shipping trade which, while on the one hand it would be quite possible to exaggerate their importance and take too serious a view of their importance, it would on the other hand be exceedingly foolish to ignore and not give due consideration to. You may accept this offer or you may decline it, as seems best to you in your wisdom, but of one thing be sure—

Here was an expert, a man who lives on the other side, who owned and managed a vast line of steamships going in different directions, talking to his own people, not to outsiders—> but of one thing be sure, American capital is coming into the Atlantic trade, and is coming into the Atlantic trade to stay. The Atlantic trade is a peculiar trade in this respect, that it is almost entirely an east-bound trade. Your vessels going out to the United States take practically nothing. They do not pay their way, or anything like it. The profit is wholly made upon the return cargo.

> Now, an east-bound trade means the carriage of produce from the United States to Great Britain and the Continent. Well, the relations of Messrs. Morgan to the great railway systems of the United States are known to everybody, and you can judge for yourselves, without my enlarging upon the matter, whether Messrs. Morgan and their friends coming into the Atlantic trade would or would not come into that trade under very favorable conditions so far as they were concerned and very unfavorable conditions as far as many of their competitors were concerned.

That meant that they would be able, owning or controlling largely the terminal facilities here and largely interested in the railways which carry products to tide water, to bill them by their own ships to the exclusion of British competitors or French competitors or any other competitors.

Mr. CULLOM. They can bill them from the place where the goods start.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course they can bill them from the place where the goods start. I am glad it was done. It was a good thing to do. Good for the purchasers and good for the country, for the earnings of these ships will stay here largely. I regard Mr. Morgan as a great financial genius. He has done some great things for this country.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. Is he arguing that these people will build ships in America to carry American products or that they will build them where they can build them cheapest?

Mr. SPOONER. I am arguing that they bought these ships because they knew——

Mr. HANNA. Oh, no; this gentleman is arguing to his stockholders. He says, "If we do not sell and the people who control the shipments from the United States to Europe do not have these ships, they will build ships for themselves."

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HANNA. Where?

Mr. SPOONER. Probably where they could build them cheapest, but that is not the point.

Mr. HANNA. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the point. The point is this, as I understand it: They would buy the ships or they would build the ships, of course, where they could buy or build them cheapest, and they wanted the ships because they could control their cargoes from the United States to Europe. My point is not why Mr. Ellerman sold, but why our people bought.

In addition to that he also stated that another factor to be reckoned with was the large subsidies to American shipping contemplated by the American Government.

I believe it is true that our shipbuilding will go on, and that our marine will be built up gradually. I would almost be willing to bring those ships in and admit them to American registry for the purpose of swelling at once our merchant marine and dealing generously with them, although I am not in favor of free ships and never have been.

But I defy any man, Mr. President, who has listened to this debate or who reads it to find in it anything that has been said here by the experts which warrants the belief that the mail rate provided by this bill will overcome the adverse conditions existing as to the cost of construction, the cost of operation, and the foreign subventions and mail pay; and, as I said to the Senator from West Virginia, if it is not enough to do that it is too much to give away. If it is inadequate to equalize it is a mere gratuity, without any justification whatever.

There are many things that I should like to say about the bill, some of them as to details. I will not take the time to do it. But one word about the general subsidy. I have not believed—I may be wrong about that, too—that anyone would build ships to any appreciable extent upon the faith of a subsidy which in a year may be withdrawn by Congress.

I do not think they will have forgotten the sugar bounty, by which the Congress invited men in different States to enter upon sugar production and invited the sugar planters of Louisiana to enlarge and extend their operations. In three years it was repealed. They thought it was not good faith to repeal it. I thought so, too. How will it be with this?

There is only one thing absolutely certain to my mind as to the operation of title 2, and that is that existing ships will receive the subsidy until it is repealed. The Senator from Ohio is a great deal better judge than I am, in many respects, as to whether the men who desire to go into the ship-owning and shipbuilding business will be led to do so by a bounty which has no fixity to it, so far as the law is concerned. I intend to offer an amendment, which I will read, to be inserted at the end of the bill:

Congress reserves the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act, in whole or in part, whenever in its judgment the public interest shall so require, without in anywise interfering with the obligation of any specific contract then in force which shall have been entered into under the provisions of title hereof.

That does not of course change the power of Congress at all, but I do not want a year from now or two years from now or three years from now, if this bill shall be enacted, and if, in the opinion of a majority of each body, it is not conserving the general public good, Congress to be confronted with the argument of honor against its revocation in whole or in part.

I think it should be incorporated in the bill as notice to all the world—constant notice, not to be forgotten except through the fault of the one who forgets it—that this subsidy, which goes to every class of steamers and to sail vessels as well, is entirely in the hands of Congress, is precarious, as every Senator knows it is, and not a safe foundation to build largely upon.

Perhaps this bill may be improved. If this mail-pay provision is not adequate (some one ought to know that) to induce the construction of new ships to be operated during the fifteen years, it ought to be made adequate. We ought to do this thing right or not do it at all. For one, I do not feel at all satisfied upon that phase of this subject or with the bill as it now stands.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, it is so late in the afternoon that I have no intention of speaking at any length, but I desire to say a few words in reply to remarks made this afternoon in the course of the debate and also suggested by the speech we have just heard.

Our friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] thinks that there will be retaliation. He may be very well assured of that fact. There is not the slightest doubt about it.

The Senator also says that it is a matter of pride that the American mails shall be carried in American ships in just the same way that some of us feel that American products and merchandise shall be carried in American ships. I should like to ask the Senator what is the American mail? The American mail is not simply the letters we write. The American mail is constituted partly of the letters we receive. We both send and receive letters.

If this is good policy for us, and the Senator thinks there will be retaliation, then the British mail—that is, the letters they write to us on business—will have to come on British ships, and letters that the French write to us, engaging cotton and lard and all the other things that we sell them will come in French ships. We must not forget that the letters we receive are just as important a factor in business transactions as the letters we write.

This is all caused by the idea that some of us have that we are the whole earth. We are not; we are only a part of it, and we never will become the whole earth, no matter what bounties or subsidies we vote to corporate or other interests. We can only be a part of the earth. We must remember that in order to sell we must buy.

Now, if the people who come here and buy the cotton and the hay and the other products of this country are not permitted to carry home what they buy of us, what is the inducement for them to trade here? We can not forever sell and never buy, and we should not undertake to do it, as we have foolishly done, in my opinion, by saving all the home markets and reaching out for foreign markets, as is proposed, by subventions or subsidies, or whatever you choose to call them, to lines of steamers to any part of the earth. I want to say that I favor that part of the bill that would organize new lines of steamships and promote business. I have favored it heretofore, and I will do it again.

But, Mr. President, I understand that it is the desire of Senators to have an executive session, and as it does not make any difference to me, as I have very little to say in regard to the pending bill, I will now yield the floor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will let us have a short executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his motion?

Mr. PETTUS. I will modify my motion by moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were opened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 17, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 15, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EDDY, an additional thirty days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, for five days, on account of death in his family.

TRANSPORT SERVICE BETWEEN SAN FRANCISCO AND PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs—a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey calls up a privileged report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 157, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "requested," in line 2, and insert the following words in lieu thereof, viz: "so far as compatible with the interests of the public service, to inform the House of any and all facts that have come to his knowledge as to the conduct of the transport service between San Francisco and the Philippine Islands."

The original resolution asked for certain specified reports of inspectors of the War Department on this general subject. We prefer to request facts rather than copies of these reports. Inspection reports are essentially confidential, and it is not fair to the officers who make them not to respect their confidence. Nor can the Department expect to have the free and frank expressions about the conduct of individuals which superior officers ought to have from their inspectors if such reports are to be published. We think it inconsistent with the interests of the public service that such reports as are referred to in this resolution should be made public. The real object of the resolution is to ascertain the facts, so far as they may rightly be furnished, and we have amended it accordingly, so as to secure this end.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of the contents of the report of Col. John L. Chamberlin, inspector, of War Department, on the transport service between San Francisco and the Philippine Islands.

He will also inform the House of the contents of the report of Col. Marion P. Maus, inspector, of War Department, on same service between same points. The Secretary of War will, in each of the cases mentioned above, furnish the House with a copy of the report made to the Department.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "requested," in line 2, and insert the following words in lieu thereof, viz: "so far as compatible with the interests of the public service to inform the House of any and all facts that have come to his knowledge as to the conduct of the transport service between San Francisco and the Philippine Islands."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been submitted to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] this morning. He has been over it, and I do not understand from him that he has any particular objection to the amendment, but rather agrees with the committee. I would state that the committee desire, as much as the gentleman from Tennessee, to lay all the facts before the House. That if there be anything that ought to be allowed there it must come here. But an inspector's report, made by an inspector of the United States Army, is likely to express opinions, suggestions, and impressions as to other people that brings other peoples' reputation into question. They are necessarily confidential, and under these circumstances it is the universal rule of the War Department that such reports are not published. The real facts the gentleman ought to have, so far as it may be compatible with the public service. Accordingly I desire, with the gentleman's leave, to retain the floor, so as to allow pension legislation to come in. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only want a few minutes; not to exceed ten minutes.

Mr. PARKER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, I do not desire to detain the House this morning on this resolution. I had the honor on the 6th of March instant to introduce the resolution which has been read to the House of Representatives. The Committee on Military Affairs considered that resolution, and have adopted a substitute almost for the resolution. Mr. Speaker, I have read the resolution reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman says that the committee in amending it purpose giving to the House and to the country all the facts that have come to the knowledge of the Secretary of War on the subject of the transport service between San Francisco and the Philippine Islands that we would be entitled to if the resolution itself was adopted as I introduced it. The Committee on Military Affairs have concluded, as stated by the gentleman, that these reports are more or less confidential, and by the vote of a majority of that Committee, as I am informed, in opposition to the wishes of the minority of that committee, reported by a party vote a substitute or an amendment for the original resolution.

Now, the gentleman went a little too far when he says that I am satisfied with the resolution. I will be satisfied with it, Mr. Speaker, if the majority—and I presume they will follow the recommendations of the majority of their committee—if the majority side of the House pass the resolution as reported, and the Secretary of War, as I am assured he will by the gentleman in charge of this measure, gives us all the facts in respect to this transportation service that could be had by the original resolution. Then I will be satisfied, and that is what I have stated to the gentleman, and that assurance I have from the gentleman in charge of the resolution, after a conference with the Secretary of War. Now I have no reason to doubt, Mr. Speaker, that he will give the facts as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. The whole difference is between facts and opinions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all.

Mr. PARKER. Very often an inspector expresses a great many opinions which are not facts, a great many suggestions, and a great many suspicions that ought not to come. What we want is the facts as ascertained by the Secretary of War. If the Secretary of War spread before the public everything that was said to him by his inspectors he would not have any full, free, and frank inspection report made. It has got to be confidential. I think the gentleman agreed with me in that, that in the military service there ought of necessity to be absolute confidence between the officers of that service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I accept the statement in perfect good faith made by the gentleman from New Jersey, and upon the assurance that we are to have the facts on this subject I shall not call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment by way of a substitute for the resolution; but from this assurance and others which I need not mention coming to me, coming from a high source, that we will get these facts and all the facts, I shall not ask the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I am led with less reluctance to agree to this course and waive our right to call the yeas and nays for a further fact which I will mention. On the 12th day of March, six days after I had the honor to introduce the original resolution into the House of Representatives, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution almost identical in words with the original resolution which I introduced. I will read in my time, for it is only four or five lines, the resolution of the Senate passed unanimously on the 12th day of March.

Mr. RAWLINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to send to the Senate the reports of Inspectors Carpenter and Morse and any other information, if any, in possession of the War Department relating to the free shipment or transportation of goods for private firms or individuals to or from the Philippine Islands in Government transports."

That resolution was unanimously adopted on the 12th of March by the Senate, six days after I had introduced the original resolution into this body. The only mistake in that resolution is the use of Inspector Carpenter's name for Inspector John L. Chamberlain's name—a misprint, as I am informed.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Senate passed this resolution, almost identical with my own, calling for these reports, and inasmuch as we are now about to pass, I presume, the resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, calling, not for the reports, but the substance of the reports, I will waive the right I would otherwise have claimed to have the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I am content with what I have said, and submit the question to the House of Representatives, hoping and believing that we will have all the facts in connection with this transport service called for by the original resolution. If I am not misinformed, they will make a chapter of very interesting reading for the people of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a motion to reconsider, and I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will make it.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following change of reference was agreed to:

The bill (S. 3320) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide G. Hatch—from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Pensions.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in their order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole may consider in its regular order House bill 1592, for the relief of S. M. Bowles, concerning his military record. It hardly falls within the strict rule, but approximates it closely. I would like to have it considered along with the other cases.

The SPEAKER. Is this for the correction of the record of the soldier?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It is to correct the mustering of the soldier.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole may be instructed by the House to consider House bill 1592. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to establish such a precedent as that. I object.

The motion of Mr. SULLOWAY was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, with Mr. CAPRON in the chair, for consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar under the rule.

SAMUEL WELCH.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6467) granting an honorable discharge to Samuel Welch.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of and grant an honorable discharge to Samuel Welch, late private, Company F, Third Wisconsin Volunteer Cavalry, and now a resident of Delton, Wis.: Provided, That no pay or allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

NELSON JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11052) for the relief of Nelson Johnson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Nelson Johnson, late first sergeant Company A, Third Regiment New York Volunteer Light Artillery, at the rate of $12 per month, the same to be paid to him under the rules of the Pension Bureau as to mode and time of payment, without any deduction or rebate on account of former alleged overpayments or erroneous payments of pension.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nelson Johnson, late of Company A, Third Regiment New York Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month, the same to be paid to him under the rules of the Pension Bureau as to mode and times of payment, without any deduction or rebate on account of former alleged overpayments or erroneous payments of pension."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Nelson Johnson."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have a letter read at the Clerk's desk as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAMDEN, N. J., March 8, 1902.

Hon. T. W. SIMS.

MY DEAR SIR: As a long-term soldier of the civil war, and as a member of the pension committee of the Union Veteran Legion, I desire to thank you on behalf of my comrades on the manly, patriotic stand you have taken against political favoritism in the granting of pensions.

It is time somebody had told the truth about the pension question. Favoritism prevails to such an extent that the veteran has come to regard his pension more as a political perquisite than as a Government reward. I can not think it was ever the intent of the people of this country, in their desire to assist the veterans, that it should become part of the "spoils" system of party machinery.

I have recently made a pretty thorough analysis of the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions and am amazed at the inequality and injustice that is apparent. The most vicious feature, of course, is the special-act pensions, by which men with no service record and no pensionable status receive larger pensions through political influence than the deserving veteran who has to depend on the merits of his case alone. To the faithful soldier of the civil war the present system of granting pensions is a humiliation and an insult. In the first place, he is regarded as an imposter and perjurer and the burden of proof to the contrary is placed on him. He is subjected to expenses and tedious delay and examinations by boards whose reports are discredited by the Commissioner of Pensions, as per page 67 of his report. The pension system could be simplified and millions of expense saved by a law granting a specified amount and simply requiring the applicant to prove his identity with the name on the original enrollment on file in the War Department. The time has come when this could be done without regard to disability of claimant, as any man 60 or more years of age is physically incapacitated from hard manual labor.

One great evil of the favoritism shown is the fact that those who receive pensions in that way no longer have any interest in the thousands of their deserving comrades. They have got their pull, and every vestige of fraternal interest and comradeship is lost sight of in their selfish success, and they do not want the pension question discussed for fear it may imperil their political perquisite. On behalf of my comrades I protest against paying the widow of any President $5,000 per year without regard to her income, while the widows of the common soldiers, faithful, loyal, devoted wives and mothers as the Lord ever permitted to live, are paid $8 per month after declaring an income of less than $250 per year.

And I am speaking on behalf of tens of thousands of my comrades when I say that we would rather see the entire pension system abolished than see it abused by and through political favoritism.

My great interest in this question is my apology for tresspassing on your valuable time.

With kind regards, yours truly,

H. M. AVIS,
941 Cooper Street, Camden, N. J.
(Late Company F, Twelfth New Jersey Volunteers, Civil war.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word upon the letter that has just been read at the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. The sentiments expressed in the letter are the legitimate fruit of the speech that was made which called it forth. At the time that speech was made a large part of the remarks were addressed to the criticism of the work of the Invalid Pensions Committee. As a member of that committee during the last Congress and during this Congress, I have never known any bill to pass the committee by reason of political favoritism, and if the gentleman himself adopts the language of the letter and makes that accusation against the committee he does injustice to himself and also does injustice to the committee. Bills that are passed by the Invalid Pensions Committee receive as fair consideration at the hands of as honorable men as any other bills that are passed by any committee in this House, and I think no gentleman is better aware of that fact than the gentleman from Tennessee.

The accusation itself is spread upon the record and sent abroad through the country and carries the imputation of dishonor with it. I have no intention of entering into any extended review of the remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I have no intention of making any extended remarks upon the methods of the Pension Bureau that he criticises so severely. I have very little sympathy with the methods of the present Commissioner of Pensions in the administration of his Bureau. I think his administration of it has been too severe. His application of the rules of practice in the Bureau have prevented a fair and free and beneficent administration of the beneficent pension laws; but I do object to the perpetual carping at the Invalid Pensions Committee, that it is organized for the purpose of passing pension bills through here by reason of political favoritism. No bills are passed that are not introduced by some member of this House, and if any member of the House has been so unworthy of his place in it as to introduce a bill for mere political effect, then let the blame fall upon him.

No man has yet put his finger upon such a bill that has ever passed from the committee to this House for consideration. No attempt is made on the part of the committee to grant extravagant pensions. All of them are based as fairly as we can upon an idea of equity and justice, due to the facts in each case that is presented to the committee, and every case receives careful consideration. There may be times when bills which come to this committee from the Senate are passed upon the strength of the Senate report, and the committee does not feel justified in reviewing the work of the Senate committee when they have not the entire facts before them; and yet, if in any case there appears an occasion for it, the Invalid Pension Committee asks for the original record and files of the case and makes the investigation for itself to ascertain whether it should even then pass a bill which has already passed the Senate.

Upon its own bills the committee has in every instance the testimony filed in the Bureau, and the additional testimony furnished by the member who introduced it, and, as I said in the beginning, if any member of the House has introduced a bill for the mere political effect which it will have upon himself or upon his district, let the blame fall upon him. I do object, however, to the perpetual carping at the Invalid Pension Committee as doing this kind of work, either in behalf of members of the House or in behalf of anybody else.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I think if the gentleman will do me the honor to read my remarks on that question he will see they were largely in defense of his own committee, and made no charge at all upon it, but that I had the letter read simply that the members of the House might see the view that one old soldier took of my remarks. I called to the attention of the House the fact that there was danger, on account of excessive private pension bills, of dissatisfying the old soldiers who had received pensions only through the Bureau.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Upon that subject, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the letter itself conveys the impression which the gentleman's speech made upon the country and upon the soldiers who read it. The letter itself carries the imputation against the committee, charging it with being unfair in the granting of indiscriminate and extravagant pensions, when the entire pension roll granted by the Invalid Pension Committee for two years amounted to only $237,000 per annum out of the whole $145,000,000.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I appeal to you because you have the floor. I would like to have, through you, the question asked of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he indorses the language of this letter.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. The gentleman from Tennessee may answer it.

Mr. SIMS. I want to answer further that I made no charge of political favoritism, and I want to say this, that I believe the Democratic members of the Pensions Committee are just as liberal as the Republicans, and I have never thought of making such a charge.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I think so.

Mr. WARNOCK. Ask him if he indorses the language of the letter.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. But that is not an answer to the question propounded by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. WARNOCK], whether the gentleman from Tennessee indorses the language of the letter. I take it for granted that he indorsed it, because he offered it to be read in his own time as part of his remarks. If he does not indorse it, I think it is his duty to say so.

Mr. SIMS. Why, upon the writer's assumed state of facts, I do indorse it, if the facts are as he says they are.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Then let me call attention to the fact that his assumed basis of fact was the speech made by the gentleman from Tennessee; but I have gone as far and much further than I intended to when I rose. I just wanted to call attention to the fact that hypercritical criticism of work of the Invalid Pensions Committee is not justified by any facts when it produces such a result as that letter.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ALBERT D. SCOVELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2767) granting an increase of pension to Albert D. Scovell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert D. Scovell, late of Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, is that for an increase of pension?

The CHAIRMAN. It is for an increase of pension.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the last pensions claims day I interrogated the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the gentlemen from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY], and asked him why it was that so many of these bills were to increase pensions. I received the following very frank answer from the gentleman:

Mr. SULLOWAY. Simply because they do not get justice at the Pension Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman arraigns the Pension Bureau?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, an injustice is done the soldier on the records of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then that rule applies to all the cases reported here this morning?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I do not remember whether all the cases that have been taken up this morning are for increase, but I think they are mostly for an increase.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have had a very frank and satisfactory explanation from the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. Chairman, turn now to the speech of my colleague [Mr. SIMS], which no one seems to dispute, and we find, on page 2432 of the RECORD, he states there were 467 bills for increases in the short session of the last Congress, and that—

Two hundred and sixty-five of that 467 increased the pensions already allowed by the Pension Bureau from 100 to 500 per cent. The average increase for all is about 200 per cent over and above what the Bureau allows.

Mr. Chairman, what I desire to do is to call to the attention of this honorable committee the fact, the remarkable fact, that here we find that because of "injustice" done at the Pension Bureau Congress is called upon to remodel the work of the Pension Bureau at a rate increased from 100 to 500 per cent. "The average increases for all is about 200 per cent over and above what the Bureau allows." That is the language of my colleague [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. Chairman, this committee is called on here every pension day to do what? It would seem that it is called on to do justice to those who have been done "injustice." In other words, to reverse the action of the honorable Commissioner of Pensions.

The question that arises, and it is growing more vital every day, is, Which is right, the Pension Commissioner or Congress? The Commissioner is openly accused, and it is undisputed by those on the other side of the House that he is doing an "injustice" to the soldiers. Not a Republican rises here to dispute this accusation. Then why, I ask, does not the distinguished President turn that Commissioner out and put in one who will do justice? Or, if there is any doubt about it, and Congress by its action in overruling the Commissioner in effect says, "The Commissioner is doing injustice," why is not a committee appointed to go down to the Pension Bureau and see what is being done there, and how it is done; study the rules and regulations; see if the right kind of officers are there, and, if you please, examine the cases that are disallowed as well as those that are allowed? If you say that Congress allows those that are disallowed, then I submit that Congress is doing what the Commissioner should do if he deals out justice instead of "injustice;" and, further, why have a Pension Bureau, and at a heavy expense, to attend to our pension business and yet so inefficiently as to burden Congress every week, a whole day or more, that justice may be done, depriving Congress of time, one day each week, to consider matters which Congress alone must consider, and which can not be referred to a bureau for adjudication?

I submit that Congress could do more work and possibly better work if it did not have to deal one whole day every week with pensions which should be adjudicated at the Pension Bureau, if "injustice" was not dealt out there which the gentleman from New Hampshire says is done.

The Pension Commissioner is held up to the public gaze as a faithful and capable officer, and for the purpose of impressing the people with the idea that his administration is just and fair; and yet he is openly accused of being unjust, and Congress every pension day cures the errors committed by the Bureau with this Commissioner at the head. Now, what are the facts? Does the Commissioner deal out justice or injustice?

The lamented McKinley perpetuated the present Commissioner in office, as does President Roosevelt. Yet both of these gentlemen every week approved, without the least hesitation, it seems, the bills which Congress enacts, which in effect overrules and condemns the action of the Pension Commissioner. In other words, he is kept in office and held up to the world as capable, faithful, and efficient by the President of the United States and yet the President of the United States every week approves laws enacted to eliminate the errors of the Commissioner passed by the Congress of the United States whose judgment in effect is, by enacting these laws, an approval of the accusation that the Commissioner is dealing out "injustice to the soldiers," just as he is accused. With one hand the President says we will keep the Commissioner in office because he is just, with the other hand he approves laws which in effect say the Commissioner is unjust. Now, what is the fact? What is the truth? Who is to blame?

Mr. Chairman, it seems that the Republican party "is working both sides of the street." They blow hot and they blow cold. They are holding up in a way as a faithful Commissioner Mr. Evans—and my colleague [Mr. SIMS], like myself, have several times on the floor of this House joined in holding up his hands as a faithful officer in our effort to make the pension roll the roll of honor—and yet a Republican Congress, with the approval of the President, comes right along every week and in effect reverses the Pension Commissioner in his many holdings of error, wherein Congress and the President say that he has in fact done "injustice" to the soldier. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the public should know where the fault is, if there is any fault; where the wrong is, if there is any wrong, and who the wrongdoer is. Now, look for a moment at the remarkable statement of my distinguished colleague [Mr. SIMS], which no man has dared to dispute in this House, and if he is incorrect about it no man, I dare say, would rejoice more to be corrected than he would. Turn now to page 2434 of the RECORD and read what he says about increased pensions. He says:

Here are the cases of $12 to $24, $12 to $30, $12 to $50, $8 to $20, $12 to $40, $6 to $24, $14 to $50, $14 to $30, $12 to $36, $6 to $17, $8 to $30, $12 to $24, $8 to $20, $25 to $40, $36 to $100, and so on through the entire list.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe in just pensions. I have been here every pension day and helped to make a quorum and to prevent unjust pensions being allowed and to have just ones allowed. But I say when we see such an appalling statement as this, if it is undisputed it shows that there is something radically wrong.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. KLEBERG. Do you think Congress ought only to exercise its discretion in those cases where the Pension Commissioner has refused to give a pension at all? Suppose he refuses to give a pension to anyone, will the gentleman from Tennessee say that those are the only cases that ought to come before Congress?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think Congress has the power to control the whole matter. But these are all for "increases in amount of the pension."

Mr. KLEBERG. Then, if that is so, does not the gentleman know that some of these cases in which an increase is given are more meritorious than those that call for a pension the first time?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I do not know; but here is the fact. Here is this great body; and, Mr. Chairman, I am staying within the undisputed record; I am not technical and I am not hypocritical about this matter and I am saying this in perfectly good faith. If the Commissioner is not doing his duty, Congress ought to know it; and if Congress is doing its duty, it is clearly showing that the Commissioner is not doing his. If "injustice" is being done in that office, and the Commissioner is simply administering the law, he is doing his duty, and we are called on here, if the law and not the Commissioner is doing "injustice," to change the law. But it is the "Bureau" and not the law that is accused of doing "injustice." If it is the "Bureau" that does "injustice" change the Bureau, and not keep the Bureau and change the law. We say by what we do here it is the law that does "injustice," and yet the "Bureau" is accused of the act. Here in substance is what the great "watch dog of the Treasury," the gentleman from Illinois, said the other day to my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] in substance: "I hope that you will have the pictures of the medical examiners of the Pension Bureau that are sitting down there in the Pension Office doing wrong to the pensioners and the pension claimants of this country, I hope you will have their pictures put in some book about to be published, giving the picture of the Pension Bureau down there." That building was too ugly to be pictured in this book, so the gentleman, with some sarcasm, wanted the pictures of these distinguished doctors put in there, so that the people should see their faces.

If these examining doctors are not doing their duty they ought to be turned out.

Right here, in conclusion. I came across from the Philippine Islands with as fine a lot of Army officers as ever lived in the country, and they talked to me of this very thing. Some of them had served during the civil war; and one of them said: "Mr. GAINES, I hope I will never have to draw a pension." There were several of these officers present. This officer said: "There is so much said about pensioners on the roll that I do not feel like getting my name on it, and I hope Congress will purge it of all unjust pensioners and make it a roll of honor."

Mr. Chairman, that is what I would have it, and I am satisfied that is the hope and desire of my colleague [Mr. SIMS], as well as every Democrat on the floor of this House. We want the pension list, sir, a roll of honor; no more, no less.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE W. GUINN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9999) granting an increase of pension to George W. Gwinn.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out all of lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of Hannibal C. St. Clair, late first lieutenant Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Hannibal C. St. Clair."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN H. JACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 658) increasing the pension of John H. Jack.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Jack, late sergeant in Company E, Eighth Regiment Ohio Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 a month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On March 12, 1902:

H. R. 1198. An act granting a pension to Joshua H. Buckingham; and

H. J. Res. 106. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the American Revolution certain revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.

On March 14, 1902:

H. R. 199. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1901.

EDWARD KERSHNER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th instant (the Senate concurring), I return herewith the bill H. R. 5224, entitled "An act for the relief of Edward Kershner."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 15, 1902.

The bill above referred to is as follows:

An act (H. R. 5224) for the relief of Edward Kershner.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint Edward Kershner as medical director in the Navy on the retired list.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that message, I offer the following resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Bearing upon the message just read, the gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 5224) for the relief of Edward Kershner be transmitted to the Senate, with the request that the Senate reconsider its action in passing said bill, in order that an amendment may be made to the same by striking out the word "director" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "inspector."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to have the gentleman make some statement explaining the resolution.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, as was explained on a previous occasion, by my colleague on the Naval Committee [Mr. BUTLER], this bill passed the House and Senate, restoring Edward Kershner to the Navy as a medical director. At the time his connection with the Navy ceased he was a medical inspector. This mistake was overlooked. The bill passed both Houses and went to the President before attention was called to it. It has been recalled for the purpose of correcting this error.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It simply restores him to the same position which he occupied before.

Mr. DAYTON. To the position that he occupied before, while the bill as it was passed restored him to a higher position, a higher rank, and higher pay.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to a suggested amendment in this case, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "the," in line 1 of the resolution, insert the words "message of the President and;" so that it will read: "Resolved, That the message of the President and the bill (H. R. 5224)," etc.

Mr. DAYTON. I thank the Chair for the suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege and send to the desk an article which appeared in the press of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, Friday, March 14, 1902.]

Representative MINOR, of Wisconsin, is no longer opposed to the shipping subsidy bill and is decidedly friendly to the Ways and Means side of the Cuban controversy. A few days ago he was against the shipping bill and decidedly opposed to the Ways and Means fight for Cuban reciprocity. It all came about in this way:

Speaker HENDERSON sent for Representative MINOR and asked him if he cared for the bill pending in the Senate placing the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States on an equality with the naval service. He replied that he cared very much for the revenue bill, for personal and public reasons.

"Very good," said the Speaker, "I think it will be possible to get a rule for the revenue-cutter bill, if you can assist us in the passage of the Cuban reciprocity measure. Furthermore, we would like your aid in passing the shipping bill."

Mr. MINOR is a member of the committee which handles the shipping bill, and is one of the two Republicans against it. He now sees no harm in the shipping subsidy measure, and is extravagantly friendly to the Ways and Means attitude toward the Cuban reciprocity scheme. The Revenue-Cutter Service bill was to-day reported from the Senate Committee on Commerce, and will eventually pass the Senate and come to the House. MINOR'S interest in the bill is very great, and his change illustrates how the Speaker has been bringing support to his position.

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Speaker, I am now serving my fourth term in this House, and this is the first time that I have ever had occasion to rise to a question of personal privilege.

I want to state here and now that I have always received the most courteous treatment from the presiding officers and from the membership of the House, and I may add also that the press has treated me kindly, justly, and courteously. And, sir, were it not for the fact that the honor of another gentleman besides myself is involved in this flagrant, false article, I should pass it over; but this article involves the presiding officer of the House, and I can not afford to rest quiet under the imputation and charge.

I want to denounce that article as absolutely and unqualifiedly false. There is not even a foundation upon which to base even a respectable lie, if you please. The Speaker of the House has never sent for me to confer upon any measure during this term of Congress. It is true that there is a difference between the presiding officer and myself in respect to certain questions now before the Republican membership of this House. He knows it; I know it; the Republican members of this House know it; and yet never, by act, by word, or intimation has he attempted to change my views.

So far as the shipping bill is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it has been mutually agreed by the Republican members of this House that no action should be taken until the Senate first acts; and when they have passed that bill, if they do pass it, and send it over here, we will take it up like intelligent men and treat it upon its merits, I do not know, neither does any member of this House know, just what action we will take on it. I do not know how I will treat it, for it has not yet been acted upon by the House. The Speaker has never spoken to me in his room in reference to this measure, pro or con, for or against it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The bill has not been considered in the committee.

Mr. MINOR. The committee has never taken the matter up for consideration, because we considered it would be improper until the Senate has first acted. The committee are ready to face that responsibility when this bill may be brought before us; and, as I said before, we will treat it justly and courageously, without reference to what may or may not be done by any other body or any individual of this House. The Speaker does not know to-day what my position will be upon that bill. He has never asked me privately, publicly, or otherwise.

I met him not long ago here in front of the Clerk's desk, and he said to me: "I think you people (meaning our committee) will have to handle this subsidy bill later along, because it looks as if the Senate might pass it." I said: "Mr. Speaker, we will handle it when the Senate has passed it, and we will treat it carefully."

Now, in respect to the rule regarding the Revenue-Cutter Service, this article says that bill was reported out of the Senate Committee to-day. Mr. Speaker, that bill putting the Revenue-Cutter officers on all fours with Army and Navy officers passed the United States Senate three weeks ago, and it was sent here. It has been carefully considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and has been reported upon favorably by that committee, and I say to you that, as is customary with the House members, I did go to the Speaker and asked him if he would give us a rule to consider the Revenue-Cutter bill. I tell you, members of the House, now, that I received no encouragement whatever. He did not consent to give that rule. On the contrary, I said to some of my friends that it was a question whether we received a rule or not. So much for that.

So that, from the beginning to the end of this article, it is infamously false; and, Mr. Speaker, I say to you now that, while I have the utmost respect for the representatives of the press, I believe they are splendid and intellectual gentlemen, and when their efforts are directed aright they are a power in the land for good, and when directed wrongly they are a power for evil.

I say, further, that any representative of the press that has been accorded the privilege of the press gallery of this House, that so forgets his honor, his duty, and his regard for truth and justice as has this one, that he ought to be expelled from the gallery; and we can do no less, it seems to me, than expel him. And you gentlemen here, the representatives of the press of this country, I call on you to expel the black sheep from your flock. We demand it; it is right; it is just. Ah, the press can pull down the purest character of any man in the land, however great he may be, and, on the contrary, they can build him up, however unworthy he may be.

Sir, the time has come when flagrant falsehoods and base insinuations that have gone out against the membership of this House should receive some consideration. We should arise in our might and protect our individual honor; and, sir, I demand that that shall be done. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks proper to say, in view of the fact that he is referred to in the article read, that so far as the article is concerned and its statements, the averments of the gentleman from Wisconsin are absolutely true. There is not one word or shadow of truth in any statement made in that article.
